"The transfer of our popular Magistrate and Collector F. H. B. Skrine, E-quire, is a great loss to Biographiis. During the time he had been in our indist a period of about a year of so, he won the respect and admiration of all with whom he came in contact both in public and private life, an account of exceptional ability, clear-lieadedness, coolness of judgment and strict integrity with which he faced all questions that came before him. He never sought for popularity, while on the other hand popular voice sought him out. The manner with which he cherished his subordinates and ruled people during his short stay at Biography, it described, would require a volume."

Mr. Skime is exceptionally fortunate. Wherever he has been he has left a name which is cherished with regard and gratitude.

THE Porte has not wholly rejected the proposals of the Pawers with regard to Armenia. The Sultan, however, declares that he will resist any scheme for European control over the administration in any part of Turkey. The Russian papers are in favour of an International Conference.

THE German forces in the Cameroons have severely defeated the rebellions Bikoko tribes, storming four of their strongholds, and killing two handred men. The German loss was twelve killed and forty-seven wounded.

THE Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company entertained Prince Nasrulla at luncheon on June 7, on board the Company's steamer Caledonia at the Ducks, Mr. Fowler, Secretary of State for India, was among the guests present. Mr. Fowler said that the country was proud of the Chitral campaign. England would hold India come weal or woe, and do her duty by all races and creeds. A telegram has been received from the Amir of Afganistan cancelling letters that had been written uiging the speedy return of the Shahzada, and agreeing to Mr. Martin's suggestion to prolong the visit of Prince Nasrulla till the beginning of September. The Prince is now on his Provincial tour. The first to receive him was Biriningham where he minutely inspected the Small Arms Factory. He next arrived at Manchester and displayed equal interest in the various cotton manufactures. Seven miles of the Manchester Ship Canal were traversed on the journey to Liverpool, where the Shahzada was welcomed by the Mayor and leading citizens. Replying to addresses, he said he hoped his visit to England would stengthen the alliance between the two countries. He is now at Glasgow. In teply to a question, Mr. Fowler said that the entire cost of the Prince's visit to England would be borne by India.

THE Daily Telegraph has opened a subscription for a national testimonial to the champion cricketer, Dr. W. G. Grace. The subscription is limited to one shilling. There is a similar move in Calcutta.

THE Itahan elections have been most turbulent. Several murders are reported from different places. Count Luigi Ferrari, moderate Sortilist Deputy and ex-Secretary of State, died, on June 10, from the effects of a revolver shot. His assailant is an anarchist named Rimini. The same day, the Italian Parliament was opened by King Humbert. In his speech he referred in cordial terms to his friend the Euspeijor of Gennary. He also spoke of the most intimate friendship existing between Italy and Great Britain, a proof of which was especially displayed by the Litter acceding to the request made by Italy for stopping the importation of aims into Abyssima through the Sumah ports.

Another letter from Colonel Neville Chamberlain has appeared in the Times against the recention of Chitral. The orner arges the expediency of adopting the frontier policy of Lord Lawrence.

In the Chamber of Deputies, on June 10, M. Handtany delivered an important speech on foreign affairs, in the course of which he declated that the French Government had joined Russia in opposing the conditions of peace arranged between Jipan and China at Simonasaki, firstly, owing to her albance with Russia. By refusing her support, France would have left Russia to confront difficulties which would have maimed the general policy of Russia. Secondly, because the provisions of the Simonasaki Treaty imperilled the existence of China, whose provinces opened a vast field for trade with the French Colonies in Indo China. M. Ribot challenged the Minister for Foreign Affairs to produce the treaty of albance with Russia to which he referred, but this M. Handtaux declined to do. After some debate the foreign policy of the Government was approved by a majority of 260 votes.

INTELLIGENCE has been brought at Shanghai that the Foreign Mission stations at Kiating and Yochou have been burned. The property has been completely destroyed. The Chinese officials are refusing to afford any protection.

A COMMERCIAL treaty has been signed between Russia and Japan. It is said to be identical with that arranged with Great Britain regarding the most Favoured Nation Clause.

THE Times publishes a telegram from its correspondent at Odessa stating that one thousand Russian troops have been despatched to reinforce the frontier guard on the borders of Armenia.

FIVE French Banks have signed an agreement to lend China fifteen millions sterling under the Russian guarantee. News of the arrangement has been received with marked disfavour at Berlin and London. In the latter city especially much displeasure is expressed, because China will be placed thereby in complete subservience to Russia. It is stated at St. Petersburg that negotiations for the evacuation of Corea will take place between Russia and Japan after the retirement of the Japanese troops from the Liaotung Peninsula has been finally settled. The interest payable on the Chinese loan is fixed at four per cent., secured on the Customs receipts at the treaty ports and the absolute guarantee of Russia. The issue price will be about ninety eight. The Japanese troops occupied Taipeldu in Formosa on the 7th instant.

COUNT Goluchowski, the new Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs, addressing the Hungarian delegation at Vienna, declared that he would adhere to the policy of Count Kalnoky, especially with regard to a peaceful Tuple Alliance as the best calculated to foster friendly relations between all the Power.

RAJA Ram Singh, Commanding the Kashinir State troops, has been created Commander of the Bath.

THE British, French and Russian Ambassadors have presented a note to the Porte demanding the disarmament of the Bedouins and the payment of an indemnity for the outrage at Jeddah. The Porte has replied urging the extreme difficulty of disarming the Bedouins. The British war vessel Dolphin has arrived at Jeddah.

THE Committee of the French Chamber has resolved to demand a full discussion in the Chamber regarding the petition of Native Egyptians organized by M Deloncle against the reformed judicial procedure.

THE Spanish Government has decided to quell the Cuban rebellion at any cost. Preparations are being made for the despatch of 40,000 troops to the island in August.

PRESIDENT Cleveland has ordered the vigorous enforcement of the neutrality laws in connection with the rebellion in Cuba, and the severe punishment of all offenders.

THE free silver convention organized at Memphis is being attended by about two thousand delegates who advocate the fixing of the ratio at sixteen to one.

THE Royal Humane Society has just rewarded a little fellow of eleven years of age, named Fred. B. Cooper, who has only the use of one hand. Finding another boy fallen through the ice in the recreation ground running by the Trent, he went to his rescue by lying flat on the ice; seized the drawning boy by his collar; raised him from the water, and, placing him on his back, brought him to the bank.

THE Chitial Expedition has changed the custom of the Bajaurs, in one notable instance, at least. These people after reaping their crops, that is, cutting the ears of wheat or barley, not only neglected what still remained, but burnt them, probably to manure the soil for a future season. Finding that the Expeditionary Force required straw for the troops and transport, they have given up their old practice and is prepared to reap another harvest from the same crop

A CORRESPONDENT from Janbatai Pass wrote to a contemporary that "We simply sit still all day, as there is nothing to do. Now that all the fighting is over, it is as did as can be. One is not allowed to leave camp or the high toad for more than a nule, except with an escort of six aimed men, so shouting is out of the question, even if one had a gim, which one has not, or if there were game in these hills, which there does not appear to be."

That statement is traversed by another, a non-commissioned officer, who says that "the troops are hard at work on fatigues of every description, and although fighting is over, the men have to sleep with their fingers almost on the trigger or sword belt, to be ready to put

RAI Ishri Pershad, of Patna, charged with bad livelihood, has, after a lengthened investigation, been ordered to enter into a persona recognizance for Rs. 25,000 and to furnish two sureties for Rs. 12,500

THE Cantonment Rules and Regulations require that "Every person shall keep in proper repair the boundary walls, fences, or other enclosures of his estate or premises." Under it, but without quoting it, the Cantonment Magistrate of Barrackpore served a notice on the Agent-a native-of the owner, Miss Furbes of Purneah, of House No. 27, calling upon him to paint the gate and the boundary walls. The notice was unheeded, in that the gate and fencing were in good condition and the law did not prescribe painting. This neglect was visited with a summons and ultimately a fine of Rs. 10 by Captain Wake, the Cantonment Magistrate. On appeal, the Magistrate of the 24-Parganas upheld the conviction and confirmed the sentence. The matter has now come up to the High Court. So Griffith Evans on behalf of the Agent has obtained a rule calling for the records and for revision of the judgment of the District Magistrate.

THE Governor General in Council has laid down for the guidance of Courts and Magistrates in the territories administered by the Chief Commissioner of Assam the following rules :--

Rule I.—No boy shall be sent to a reformatory school on a first conviction (except as provided in Rule III), if under ten years of age, for a less period than five years; if over ten, for a less period than three years, unless he shall some rattain the age of 18.

Rule II.—On a subsequent conviction for a similar offence a boy under ten years of age shall not be sent to a reformatory school for a less period than seven years; if over ten, for a less period than five years; unless he shall sooner attain the age of 18.

rs; unless he shall sooner attain the age of 18.

(1) In the belongs to a crininal tribe within the meaning of Act XXVII of 1871, section 2;

(2) If either of his parents is a habitual criminal;

(3) If he is destitute; and

(4) If the offence of which he is convicted is one arguing

- great depravity—that is, general cocuption of moral apart from the specific criminality of the particular act.

In the N.-W. Provinces and Oudh, the principle seems to be that boys who have reached the age of 13 or who have only been convicted once should not be sent to the Reformatory; and no boy over 10 years of age can be confined for a less period than five years, unless he shall sooner attain the age of 18 years. It does not appear though that the rule is observed. In commenting on the Annual Report on the Reformatory School at Bareilly for 1894, the Local Government remarks-"Either the ages as entered in the warrants are incorrect, or the seatences of no less than 13 buys are illegal with reference to the rule."

In sentencing, magistrates are not to be guided by only the ages of the boys. They must also take into consideration the accounmodation in the Reformatory. We remember the Calcutta magistrates being once asked not to order Reformatory, on that account. At the Bareilly school, opened on the 1st April 1889, there is accommodation for 232 boys with separate cubicles for each, besides hospital accommodation for 24. Last year, the average attendance was 207 87. For the first year (nine months only) it was 36'86, and the second 85'30. In 1894, 65 were admitted and 44 discharged on completion of sectence. Details as to 43 of the 55 boys trained and discharged are available. The result is satisfactory. Only four are known to have lapsed into crime.

The Bareilly is the only Reformatory in India where boys are taught agriculture and at least one trade. The farm has an area of 3714, and the garden of 81/2 acres. The Superintendent reports that a very considerable number of boys show no aptitude whatever for any trade, being fitted only to be 'hewers of wood and drawers of water." He therefore suggests that "where boys have made no progress in learning a trade within a reasonable time (say one year), the attempt should be given up, and that these boys should be kept at agricultural work." He would make them "do all the hard work of the Refinmatory, such as drawing water, sweeping and removing rubbish, &c."

The teaching of tride is to be abandoned because there are not sufficient orders to keep the boys employed.

cient orders to keep the boys employed.

"In selecting trades to be taught we have not only to consider what is likely to be useful to the boys in afier-life, but also whether sufficient work can be got to keep the factiny going. Blacksonth's work, carpentry, darie-weaving and cloth-weaving have, at different times, been tried, but have had to be given up for want of sufficient orders. The trades now taught in addition to farming and gardening are, canework, somemaking, tailoring and carpet-weaving. Of these the most satisfactory is the cane-work; financially it is a success. Sufficient orders are received to keep all hands employed; and although it is not likely that any large number of the boys employed in it will earn a livelihood in after-life by wickerwork, they are all trained to be neat-handed, and to most of them it will be an advantage to be able to make biskers, &c. In the tailor's shop iff the boys' clothing is mide; but few outside orders are received, and there is consequently little cash profit. A sewing-machine was purchased last year, and several boys are very expert in using it.

Shoe-making has been carried on since the Reformatory was opened, but it has not proved as successful as I had hoped. A number of trade postructors have been fried, but we have failed to secure one who at the same time trustworthy and a competent workman. It is especially in this factory that materials are wasted and made away with. A fair number of orders are received, but large numbers of shoes are returned as mislifts, and have to be sold for less than the cost of the materials. A number of boys have been trained to be really good shoe-makers: but I find that of ten boys discharged from the school when had been trunk this trade only tenangual and the school. shoe-makers; but I find that of ten boys discharged from the school when had been tanght this trade, only two now earn their living by it. I should have no hestation in advising this industry to be put a stup to if I could suggest anything suitable to take its place.

Carpet-weaving was started in July last at the request of Sir John Tyler. Only a small number of boys have been taught this industry. All the qualitis made have been sold."

Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel E. Man is a law unto himself. Carpetweaving is not sanctioned by the rules of the Reformatory. Another departure was the punishment of imposing guiny-clothing. Two of the boys were for the first time so punished for destroying school property. The sanctioned punishments are-flogging; hand-caping; solitary cells with penal diet; solitary cells; morning meal stopped; reduction from monitorship; suspension from monitorship; gratinty stopped; change of labour; locked up at play hour; warned. The Superintendent completed the dozen. Why not take out a patent of a M or cat o' twelve?

We are glad to find that nothing escapes the eye of the Officiating Lieutenant-Governor. Not only the departures are prohibited, but urder is made to take order for restriction of the teaching of trades.

One of the punishments speaks of gratuity. Gratuities are earned by good conduct, diligence in school and work in the factories. The best boy carus an anna a week. He is allowed to spend half, the other half being placed to his credit in the Savings Bank which he can draw on release. During the year 1894, Rs. 238-3-9 was paid as gratury and Rs. 107 13 6 deposited in the Bank.

As was to be expected, the Januagar succession is not to go uncontested. But there is no legally constituted Court to decide the question. The Foreign Office is the arbiter of om Princes and has already put one on the gadi, and it is not likely that it will undo its own work. As king-maker, it is to be supposed that, like a king, it can do no winng. The Proneer tries to justify the elevation of Jaswantsingly, the younger morganatic son as it describes him, to the exclusion of Ranntsingji who was adopted as heir and who would succeed the Jam Viblian in ordinary course, as the next heir of pine blood, and to the supersession of the elder morganatic son and his son, all of whom were proclaimed heir by the last Jam. Repeatedly requested by Jam Vibhan, the British Government had refused to acknowledge any of the sons so put forward, reserving its right to choose the successor when the time came. When that time arrived, without examining the claims of others, it at once installed the youngest of them all, a minor. This virtually places the Raj under the administration of the Foreign Office and a Bittish Political. In the same way, the youngest of the three brothers searched out to supply a Gaekwar, was selected, that the Baroda State might long be under British management. Miharani Jumna Bai stoutly stuck to the eldest. At last, a compromise was made when the second succeeded the deposed Mulhariao. The Proneer makes no secent of the preference in the present succession. It says: "It should be recollected that the Jamanagar State is in debt, and that there is need of opinion of the Political Agent, publicly expressed at the installation of the new Jam, Under these cucumstances a minor, who is well in hand, is perhaps more acceptable to the Bombay Political Department than one who has been honized in Englandnot as a semi-barbaric Oriental curiosity, but as an educated Indian noblem to, who has excelled on the national game of England," Minority of the Chief may be a blessing to a State, but is the rightful heir, on that account, to be kept out of his due? An incapable Chief is easily shunted out of the gadi. The present ruler of Bhortpore was accepted, against the wishes of his father, that he might be sent out of his dominions. The writer whom we have quoted seems to think that royal houses in India, proud Udeypore not excepted, cannot claim purity of blood, "Even among the Jareja Rajputs, to whom the late Jam belonged, there was a notorious case of a Moslem marriage." A son of his, therefore, by a Mussalmani need not therefore be unacceptable to the people of Januagar. But are they prepared to accept hun? If there were no opposition he might pass. The British Government ought not lightly to reject an objection based on bastardy. It is no crime of the base-born. But the stain sticks to him. It is as much galling to himself as to the people over whom he is set to rule. Gopal Sing of Chambi, as we only last week pointed out, had to abdicate. Maharajkumar Bulwant Rao Scindia was not allowed the uppermost hand in the Gwalior Council of Regency, though he was fitted by education, because of his blot. We do not know Ranjit. singuand, are not aware that he has made a claum. His inclination confines him to the cricket field where he is earning glory in another part of the world. He seems content with the allowances paid him by the Durbar, Kulubhat is differently minded. He thinks he is the rightful heir to the late Jam, the son of his father who was proclaimed heir-apparent. The father might have been discarded, but the right through him remains.

THE Mussulmans in London bave held a demonstration in opposition to the movement against the Saltan in connection with what are called Armenian Atrocities, Those who cannot endure a Mahomedan sovereign in Christian Europe have, before the Commission now sitting, has spoken, spoken out their mind, fixing the guilt on the Sultan. his afficers and men. The oppositionists in the no such hold assertion, They cry-Wait till you have heard the last. The proceedings of the meeting will be found elsewhere.

ONE Bhutnath Day had come down to Calcutta from Baidyabat for treatment of his left eye which was diseased. He was admitted to the Mayo Hospital. There he was put under chloroform and his eye operated upon. After it, he did not recover consciousness, and died. The morning papers report that he was a confirmed opinin-eater. An opinin-eater has many sins to answer for. Was the present death due to opinm? At the coroner's inquest. Dr. Gibboos who made the post martem examination said that he found no marks of violence on the person and his opinion was that the deceased had died from a sudden shock immediately after the operation. The verdict was that the deceased had met his death by a sudden shock, which terminated simultaneously with the failure of the heart's action. We are tempted to ask-To what was the failure of the heart's action due? How was the shock produced? Was onium the direct cause of both? Had chloroform or its admisnistration nothing to do with them? The published report of the case is very unsatisfactory. Will no full report appear?

MR Silk has been accepted by the Municipal Commissioners as their Chief Engineer during the absence on leave of Mr. Kimber. An attempt was made to introduce an Indian to the post. There was more than one such candidate, but the only name proposed was that of the reured Engineer Ru Bahadur Midhub Chunder Roy. He obtained 25 votes, while his successful rival in service hid two more.

Mr. Skrine had, before the voting commenced, protested against balloting. The Commissioners have long adopted that form of expressing their preferences, intending to vote according to their conscience uninfluenced by any extraneous considerations.

THE mortality from small-pox has gone down to ten. That was the number last week; the week before it was 24. There was a sort of debate, a one-sided one, on the subject on Thursday. Two of the medical Commissioners, one a European and the other a native, condemned the vaccination as performed during the epidemic. To say the least, the introduction of several reforms. At any rate this is the it was most perfunctorily done. "The lancets were all dirty, the rags on which they were wiped were dirtier still, the culves were far from clean and healthy, and, in fact, much of the vaccination had been more or less only blood-poisoning operations," It is a terrible charge, but comes too late for any immediate practical action. The mischief, if any, has been done and cannot be mended. The Health Officer may have his own explanation. The subject ought not to be easily and lightly disposed off. The present epidemic may have ceased to cause alarm. It is expected to break out again. Who knows the next visitation will not prove more virulent?

THE CUSTOMS REPORT.

OWING to the reimposition of duties, last year, on most of the articles of Indian imports and exports, the work of the Customs House of Calcutta has of late become an extremely onerous one. We are agreeably surprised to find that the officer in charge, Mr. F. H. Skrine, has been able to bring out the report for that year within a couple of months. It does not deal with the whole of India, but is confined to Calcutta and the ports subordinate to it, namely, Puri, Cuttack, Balasore, Chittagong and Na-The figures given and the remarks made rayanganj. are all highly interesting, and deserve careful perusal.

The total exports of Calcutta amounted to Rs. 45,80,59,114 and the aggregate value of the imports was Rs. 27,44,43,275. Mr. Skrine as a Government official has not been able to explain the significance of these figures. It must be apparent to every one acquainted with even elementary principles of the economical science, that, during the last official year, Bengal alone gave more than eighteen crores of rupees to England without receiving any tangible returns. English publicists and statesmen, and some of our countrymen too, may rejoice at this "expansion of our foreign commerce" as they call it. Strictly speaking, it is no commerce at all. For true commerce involves giving as well as taking; whereas what is called the foreign commerce of India is mainly a gift by the people of India collectively to England. The individual sellers of Indian goods do no doubt get a fair price for what they sell. The figures quoted clearly show that the English merchants do not bring from their home a sufficient equivalent for what they buy and take away from India. In fact, to a great extent, the English merchants serve only as brokers and bankers to the Government. They act as the medium for the remittance of the tribute which India has to pay to England under the name of Home Charges. They advance the amount of this tribute to the Secretary of State and with the equivalent for the same received from the Indian Exchequer, they buy Indian goods making a profit by their sale in other parts of the world. The result is the same as if England took the amount of her Indian tribute in kind and sold the goods to the European markets. Such transaction certainly could not be called commerce, and there is no reason why that name should be given to the same kind of operation when it is carried on through a third party.

To come to details, Mr. Skrine takes a very hopeful view of our jute mills. He says :-

"The exports of Gunny Bog, have rapidly expanded during the last five years, reaching the highest figures yet tabulated in the past year, the increase in comparison with 1893-94 being 8 per

There were increased shipments to the United Kingdom, to the United States and to Australia, against decreases to Egypt, China (Hong-Kong), and the Straits Settlement.

The advance to the United Kingdom is a most satisfactory one, showing that Calcutta-made Rags are continuing to find favour with the home consumers. It seems to be only a question of time for the Indian-made article to supplant the production of Dundee. These increased shipments were made in the face of a bad market and poor trade. Possibly the low rates of exchange have had some effect in producing these large shipments.

To Australia the increase was 39 per cent., due no doubt to the large Wood crop and the larger exports of Wheat of last year.

The increase in direct shipments to the United States is more than counterbalanced by the fall in those to Hong-Kong, most of the Bags sent to the latter being intended ultimately for San Francisco.

In contrast to conditions prevailing in Dundec, the Jute trade in Bengal has had a most satisfactory year, a large crop enabling very handsome profits to be made; and most of the mills have paid good dividends. Full time has been worked throughout the year, and efforts are being made to increase production by the introduction of the Electric Light to enable the mills to work all night. Extensions are also being carried out in many mills with the same

Times are at present good for Jule Mills, and proprietors are spacefully anxious to take advantage of them. This is a very apparently anxious to take advantage of them. This is a very natural desire, but there is the danger of increasing the production to such an extent that the supply will largely exceed the demand, and then will come a crash, unless old markets can be extended and new ones found. Some years ago such a state of affairs did occur; and the trade fell into a most unsatisfactory condition, from which it took some time to recover. It is to be hoped that the extensions now in progress will not cause history-to repeat itself.

We may well wonder that Dundee has not followed in the wake of Manchester to advocate the inposition of excise duties on the Indian Mills and more stringent Factory law.

If left unhampered, our cotton mills might no doubt flourish in the same manner as the jute mills. We read in the report :-

"The Cotton trade in Lancashire during the past year was of an unsatisfactory character both to spinners and manufacturers, but particularly to the former. With a large crop of American Cotton there was a constant fall in the price of the raw material throughout the year, of course resulting in lower prices of Time. Oldham, the centre of the spinning industry, has been a great sufferer, and the returns of the Limited Liability Companies show losses on the working of the year. These have been so heavy that it is stated that many mill-owners would be glad to abandon the trade altogether, if they could find purchasers for their depreciated property."

The wisest course for the cotton lords of Manchester would be to give up their philanthropy and their new fangled Free Trade doctrine, and to remove their mills at once to India. Here, with cheap labour and cheap cotton, they are sure to make a profit. This ought to be obvious to them if they rightly understand the principles of Free Trade, With regard to the effect of the recent l'ariff Act on the transaction of the dealers in piece-goods, Mr. Skrine makes the following observations:

"In July and August, repeated rumours that import duties on C. ton Good: would be re-imposed at the beginning of the next financial year raised the feeling that it was quite possible such would be the case, with the result that, in the hope of getting their would be the case, with the result that, in the hope of getting their goods free of duty, importers and dealers ordered largely for delivery not later than the end of January 1895. The import duty was re-imposed on the 27th December 1894, and many of the goods previously ordered to avoid duty had to pay it. I am informed that on these transactions, consumers did not pay the duty, which was paid by the dealer on forward contract and by importers on unsold such and the pay the duty, which was paid by the dealer on forward contract and by importers on unsold such and the payer for the months Linuary to March. By goods, and on new contracts for the months January to March. Be this is meant, no doubt, that prices did not immediately rise in proportion to the duty, but that they have done or will ultimately to comment upon the evidence of the most respectable persons

If the duty on cotton piece-goods had been levied at the beginning of the year, it would have brought a large amount of revenue to the Exchequer, and saved the merchants from the losses to which they have been subjected. The vacillating policy of Government has not, we fear, done any good to any of the parties concerned. It was simply a political concession to Manchester to make out a case of strong necessity.

In connection with the subjects under consideration, we cannot do without making some observations as to the importance of the diffusion of the knowledge of trade statistics and of the economical laws regarding the production, distribution and exchange of wealth. Such study is of great importance not only to persons connected with commercial business, but to almost all classes of people, especially to those who have any philanthropic zeal for the good of this country. In the absence of a thorough knowledge of the principles of the economical science, and of the present commercial relations of the different countries, trade naturally partakes of the nature of gambling and of leaps in the dark, which may lead an adventurer to a windfall of fortune or to the Insolvency Court. The same kind of ignorance often leads the best men of our country to rejoice at the expansion of India's foreign commerce or to clamour for the reduction of the salt duty. When those who are supposed to be the most enlightened in the land are capable of taking such views, it is no wonder that the masses have misconceptions of a still more serious nature. In fact, the majority of our countrymen have a deep-rooted belief that our British masters have taken away from India all the gold and silver on which they could lay their hands, and that they have left to us instead only some pieces of paper in the shape of currency notes and Government Security bonds. The British Government has a far greater source of danger in such unfounded beliefs among the people of this country, than in the threatening attitude of the Russian Bear in the north-western frontier of India. And it is for this reason that we have repeatedly pointed to the necessity of imparting to the students of our schools and colleges a sound knowledge of Political Economy, and of the main facts and figures relating to the foreign commerce of the country. The study of Milton, Byron, Michael Madhu Sudan and Bankim has no doubt its advantages. But the student who has a sufficient knowledge of the languages in which their works are written may read them suo moto for the pleasure derivable from them, and it does not seem to be necessary to make them compulsory text books.

A VOICE FROM DINAJPORE.

TO THE EDITOR.

THE trial, under section 330 I. P. C., of Braja Rakhal Sanyal, a Sub-Inspector of Police, came to an end on the 3rd, resulting in the acquittal and discharge of the accused. The Crown was represented by Mr. Girth, Mr. Chowdhury, Baboos Ram Ratan Pattack, Prameshwar Dan, Rakhal Dass Sen, local pleaders, while the accused was defended by Mr. White, Baboos Madhab Chandra Chatterjee, Mon Mohan Ray, Lallit Chandra Sen and Prassana Kumar Bose. The case had been watched with interest by the outside public; the result has been a rude shock to them. The judgment of the Sessions Judge, Mr. R. R. Pope, is anything but satisfactory. This is the more so as he was pleased who were examined for the prosecution in the way which has greatly compromised their reputation in the estimation of their fellowmen. The prosecution had its origin in the theft of some gold ornaments off the person of a child of the Court Sub-Inspector Baboo Girish Chandra Dutta. On the 7th of March three menial servants of the local Zemindar, Ray Sahib, were arrested on suspicion and taken to the Police Station by the accused Inspector. With the help of two constables, who were also the accused in the present case, and after threatening them with punishment for theft should they refuse to give up the stolen property, he gave a sound beating to the two servants, named Jagabandhu and Sham, in the presence of Girish Bakshi, another servant of the said Zemindar, who had accompanied them to the thana. The absent Zemindar too had his share. The vilest abuse, which, to say the least, forms a part of the vocabulary of the native Bengal Police, was addressed quite gratuitously to Ray Radha Gobinda Ray Sahib, who was then at Monghyr. I blush to write the words; the witnesses to the abuse refused for "the sake of decency," to repeat them. To say that vulgar epithets were used, is to detract much from their offensiveness. The Sessions Judge is of opinion that Babu Kally Mohan Sen, a witness for the prose cution, " is the mainspring of the case," and, if I have properly understood the judgment, his son, a graduate of the Calcutta University, who, according to the Judge, expects to succeed his father as am-mooktear to the Ray Sahib, and his son-in-law, a practising pleader of the Judge's Court, a person well versed in Hindu Shastras, truthful, honest and independent, are all held by the Judge as severally and jointly contributing to the case for the prosecution. The Sessions Judge has gone the length of saying that the conduct of this latter witness, while under examination, gave the lie to his words. I profess my inability to realize the import of this stricture upon the witness, as I did not observe any peculiar expression in his countenance, nor did I find his demeanour betraying any hesitation or premeditation. These three were respectable witnesses, yet the Judge disbelieved them. The antecedents of the Sub-Inspector might fairly raise a presumption, that he might have, on this occasion, pursued the conduct alleged against him. While the respectability of the witnesses might plead against their joining in a conspiracy to humble the Inspector. It was attempted to elicit in his cross-examination that Kally Mohun Sen had a private grudge against the accused, but no evidence was given in that behalf. Two persons, who were selected as assessors, gave their verdict adverse to the defence the one entertained a legal doubt as to the complicity of the accused persons in the offence charged to them and the other believed that two of the accused were guilty, there being no evidence of any kind against the third.

The case will probably be taken up to a higher Court.

ONI PRESENT IN COURT.

Dinaipore, The 11th June, 1895.

A MUSSULMAN PROTEST.

A meeting of Mussulmans now in London to protest against "the A meeting of Mussulmans now in London to protest against "the mischievous, unjust, and ill-advised attempt of the Armana agitators to prejudice the mind of the British public against falso and the Sublime Porte," was held at the Westminster Town Hall on May 15, under the auspices of the Anjuman-islum. The president of the society, Molvi Nasir Uddin Hossin, occupied the chair, and a large proportion of those present were Moham madens. The audience also included a number of ladies.

The Chairman said :- Loties and Gentlemen, I am not going to take up much of your time, but will interely say a few words. The Eastern Question has become accentuated and threatens across.

It has always been the proud boast of Englishmen that they condemn no man without a fair and impartial hearing. (Cheers.) Genilemen, I for one rejoice to belong to this mighty empire whose kingdom is stretched from shore to shore. I approach this question is no crusading aspect, but, gentlemen, I do expect the same from our opponents. (Cheers.) How great then was my disappointment you can readily imagine when I heard the impatient denunciations of His Grace the Duke of Argyll. Here we have an eminent states-man who accuses Turkey of the vilest atrocities, and that, too, while the question is under investigation. (Cheers.) We have met Mainter the question is under investigation. (Cheers.) We have the here to cry out against this unrighteous haste and we are entitled to be heard. (Loud cheers.) In the burning plains of India Her Majesty's sway extends over nearly 70,000,000 Moslem souls. Shall you rashly arouse the religious animosities of such numbers as these? No, a thousand times no. Gentlemen, on declaring war the real and the avowed motives of the statesman are often as wide apart as the poles asunder. How often has the advancement of ivilisation simply been a mere excuse for the action of the kings? How many crimes have been committed at the instigation of Russia, that enemy of liberty? (Cheers.) You are indeed playing into the hands of Russia to breathe these vile stories of reporters, put about to form an excuse for Russia to annex Armenia and to weaken Turkey in every way. Then, ladies and gentlemen, what will if Turkey be dismembered and all her brave Turkish and Kurdish soldiers enrolled under the arms of Russia and designed for the conquest of India? (Cheers.) But the whole story of the atrocities seems to have been exaggerated. Probably the troops of the Sultan have been called in order to quell a riot. But is the sacred home of our religion to be descerated on such a charge as that ? No, say rather that the Turks and the Armenians are living side by side in contentment and peace. (Loud cheers.) There is no necessity for a Jacob to drive the rude aggressors away. What are you going to do? Are you going to expel 6,000,000 Turks, and to leave the whole country for 1,000,000 Armenians? And how are you going to distinguish them? They are scattered all over the plains? You will have, in the words of Byron, to make a solitude and call it peace. (Cheers.) You will say, let a governor be appointed with the sanction of the Powers, but is the arm of Islam to be foreshortened and to be left with a dubious Suzerainty? That is not justice, that is not international morali-ty, that is not the good faith that ought to be observed by Princes and Powers. (Cheers.) We confidently believe in the integrity of our Ulemas, and I for one do not believe that the delinquencies of the Turks are greater than those of the other Powers, and that such a step as our opponents suggest would but leave the fair same of our daughters in the hands of the captors of Russia. (Cheers.) I protest with all the indignation in imy power, and I ask you to join with me in protesting against this unrighteous haste of the party politicians in accusing the soldiery of such atrocious barbarities. The stories of the Press have been overdone, and I doubt altogether the correspondence from witnesses at such a distance from Kars that no horse could cover the distance within the time alleged. (Cheers.) My friend, M. Ximenes, has avowed from his personal knowledge that the Armenians and Yurks are living happily together, and the Armenians being the commercial class they supply all the wants and necessities of the Terks. I must say in the end, what good purpose would it serve the Subline Porte to inflict such barbarities on his subjects? (Cheers.) Has he not the policy not to attract the attention of Europe by misrule and misgovernment? (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, then I must ask my opponents to show the same respect that was shown by the draughtsmen of that great charter-I mean Magna Charta---and not to condemn Turkey before the result of the International Enquiry is known to us. (Loud theers.)
Till that time I shall continue to believe that Turkey dispenses her favours with equality, her laws with justice, and her administration with mercy. (Mr. Ghain: No; and loud cheers.)
Mr. M. A. Ghain, B. A., then moved the following resolution:—
"That this meeting of Mussulmans, representing the opinion of all Mahomedans of whom over 60,000,000 are Her Majesty's loyal subjects in India, protests against the indiscriminate and violent abuse of the Mahomedan religion and Mahomedan humanity, which marked the speeches at the Armenian meeting in St. James' Hall, on May 7th, and strongly protests against the crusade that is now being preached in England against Islam."

Mr. Ghain said the reason why they did not, like the Anglo-Armenian agitators, curse a large portion of their fellow beings was, perhaps, because they were not Christians. Their object was not to countenance any atrocities or misrule in Turkey, but to strengthen the arms of the true reformers of Turkey. (Cheers.) Mr. Gladstone, he said, that great ecclesiastical agitator---(cheers and laughter) -- and inveterate foe of the Mahomedans, had com-mitted several inconsistencies. While he avowed his desire to

Referring to the Duke of Argyll's speech, in which he said the war of 1876 arose out of the crimes of the Turks, Mr. Ghain pointed out that Lord Beaconsfield had said that the war was pointed out that Lord Beaconsheld had said that the war was caused by the secret designs of Russia upon Turkey, and was instigated by the Bulgarian insurgents against Turkey. The Duke of Argyll, he said, would a ttribute all the sins of humanity to the Turks, and that the Turkish Government was so execrably bad that any rebellion against it was just and righteous. (Shame.) The speaker then went on to refute the statement of Canon McCall, and to denounce the language he used towards the Turkish nation, and concluded his address by a protest against the insult to Islam and the Mahemmedans --- (cheers)--- and said that the British people must keep in view the interests of their vast Mahommedan populations in India, for a blow on their religion would surely recoil upon themselves. (Loud

Moulvi Mohamed Ibrahim having seconded the resolution, the Chairman called upon Sir Ashmead Bartlett, M. P., to support

Sir Ashmead Bartlett (who was received with loud cheers), said :---Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am not surprised at the indignation which is felt by Mahommedaus at the character which the Anglo-Armenian agiration has assumed. The meeting at St. James' Hall made it too evident that the agitation has degenerated into an anti-Moslem crusade. (Cheers.) The most unlimited and indiscriminate abuse was there indulged in agains: the Sovereign, the army, and the people of the Ottoman Empire. (Hear, hear.) I should not like to repeat the disgraceful language that was used, and used without a shadow of authentic proof, against the Sultan of Turkey and the whole of the Turkish army. (Cheers.) In my opinion, however, the worst feature of this agitation lies in the fact that the same people consitute themselves the prosecutors, the witnesses, the jurors, and the judge in the trying of the charges that are so lavishly made against the Turkish Government. (Hear, hear.) At this moment a Commission --- and we have every reason to believe an efficient and trustworthy Commission --- is investigating with great thoroughness into the charges of massacre and outrages which have been circulated with regard to the Sasson district. which have been circulated with regard to the sason district. (Cheers.) Attached to that Commission there are three European officials nominated by England, Russia, and France. The Commission itself was appointed by the Sultan of his own motion directly he realised the gravity of the charges made. (Cheers.) Yet these reckless villifiers of Turkey and the Mohammedan faith have not the decency to wait until the Commission has reported. (Hear, hear.) They assume all the charges against Turkey to be true. (Cheers). They multiply and exaggerate tenfold the charges that exist, and they proceed deliberately to condemn the Government, the whole army, and the whole people for these charges which, even if true, could only involve the responsibility of a very small fragment of the Turkish army. (Hear, hear.) I am not here to palliate misdeeds or cruelties of any kind. (Cheers.) I believe that the Sultan himself will be most anxious and ready to punish any of his officers who may be, on authentic evidence, convicted of responsibility for such crimes as those that have been convicted of responsibility for such crimes as those had nave been so widely charged against the Turkish troops. (Cheers.) Examination will, I believe, reduce the thousands alleged to have been killed to a few hundred, and the hideous outrages said to have been committed to some misdeeds of isolated troops, which all will deplore and hope to see punished if true. (Cheers.) I well remember the case of the so-called Bulgarian atrocities, how the action of the Turks was misrepresented, magnified, and calumniated in every way; how not one-twentieth part of the tales of outrage and massacre that were deliberately asserted to be true were ever proved; and how it was shown that the provocation came in the first place from the Bulgarian insurgents who had been stirred up by Russian money and Russian agents. These Bulgarian insurgents committed most horrible atrocities upon Musulman women and children. (Hear, hear.) It was the right and knowledge of these crimes that drew reprisals, and even then to a very limited extent, upon the Christian Bulgarians of Roumelia, (Hear, hear.) No crimes were proved against the Turkish soldiery during the whole of the terrible war of race and creeds, in spite of the awful provocation which the Turks received from the bar-barities of the Russian and Bulgarian troops. (Cheers.) I made it my business at the time to go out to the countries where these crimes were said to have taken place to investigate so far as was possible their truth, and I came to the conclusion which every other impartial investigator came to that not one tithe of the charges brought against the Mussulmans at that time were true, and that no charges were substantiated against the regular soldiers of the Ottoman Empire. (Loud cheers.) A more gallant, resolute, well-disciplined, splendid body of men than the Ottoman regular army cannot be found among the armies of the whole world. (Loud scer clear of any irresponsible testimony, he yet lends his name and support to the irresponsible and inaccurate testimony given in Mr. Green's book. Mr. Gladstone was simply playing into the hands of reckless and unsernpulous intriguers whose philanthropy is ever worked with them, every honest Correspondent who has ever ready when it can serve their political purposes. (Cheers.) and that, gentlemen, is the testimony of every man who knows anything about them. Every British officer who has ever worked with them, every honest Correspondent who has ever gone with them, seen them fight, or followed in their track, has given the same evidence. Read what Mr. Archibald Forbes, the correspondent of the Daily News, a paper most bitterly hostile to Turkey and the Turks, read what he said in his articles written Turkey and the Turks, read what he said in his articles written subsequent to the Russo-Turkish war of 1877 about the splendid behaviour of the Turkish regular soldiers. (Cheers.) Ah, gentlemen, what is the truth about the Bulgarian atrocities of 1876? Bulgaria was a peaceful and a flourishing country, more flourishing than many portions of the Christian-governed countries in Europe. than many portions of the Controllar governed countries in Europe. Russian agents and Russian gold with great difficulty stirred up an insurrection in the southern portion of Bulgaria, on the high road of the Turkish Empire in Europe. The Bulgarian insurgents rose, and they committed horrible attocities upon the Mussulman noncombatants, women and children, and it was in retaliation for these atrocities, which were witnessed by the Pomak Militia, these atrocities, which were witnessed by the Pomak Militia, that is the Mussulman-Bulgarians who were called out to repress the insurrection of the Bulgarian Christians that such evil deeds as at that time were committed, and these, as I said, were exaggerated twenty to one hundredfold. Then over a million of the innocent Mussulman peasantry, most of them women and children, were driven from their homes, exposed to every extremity of outrage and slaughter, and to the severest to every extremity of outrage and slaughter, and to the severest trial of the elements. (Shame.) Happy those who perished of starvation and cold and escaped the barbarous inhumannty of their so-called Christian enemy. (Cheers.) Nearly half a million of innocent non-combatants, women and children, perished during, and in consequence of, that horrible war. I should have liked to have seen, or to see now, some of the indignation which has been so lavishly squandered on the alleged wors of the Armenian mountaincer, devoted to the sufferings of the Mussulman inhabitants of Turkey. (Cheers.) This gross exaggeration of the evil deeds of the Turk and Mussulman rouses my keenest indignation, and makes me aslaumed of the injustice and the hypocrisy of men who call themselves Christians, and pretend to be the leaders of the Christian surface. tian sentiment. (Loud cheers.) This matter has a very serious aspect for British interests. There are over sixty millions of the Queen's subjects in India---the bravest, most loyal, most stable porgueen's subjects in india--the bravest, most loyal, most stable por-tion of our Indian fellow-subjects, who belong to the Mussulman fath. (Cheers.) There are thirty more millions of the Queen's subjects in different parts of the world of the same creed. What will these people say? What will our Mussulman allies like the will these people say? What will our Mussulman allies like the Amir of Afghanistan say when they hear of this vengeful, unjust, and wicked crusade against Islam? (Cheers.) Our fanatical agitators are trying to make out that all Mahommedans, and that every Turk and every man who professes the Mahommedan creed is necessarily barbarous, cruel, and backward. I hope I may say without offence to any gentleman of the Mahommedan faith here, that I believe in my own faith, that I believe in the Christian religion, and that because I believe in it I should like to see all men belong to the Christian religion. (Cheers.) But I would no more judge the Christian religion by the deeds of the inquisition of Torquemada 350 years ago--(cheers)---or by the intolerance of the Christian relates who burnt Joan of Arc five centuries ago, than would I judge Mahomournt Joan of Arc five centuries ago, than would I judge Mahommedans or the Mahommedan faith by the ridiculous fables which are set about now by fanatical agitators like the Bishop of Hereford McCall. (Loud cheers.) What business has Mr. Gladstone and the Duke of Argyll to pose as the champions of the Christians and the reformers of Turkey. They were members of the Cabinet whose blindness and weakness caused the Crimean War. (Loud cheers.) They were in office for nearly twenty years after the Crimeau War, with almost boundless powers. Why dd they not do something, when they had the authority and the power, to enforce upon Furkey the reform which at this thirteenth bour they have discovered to be so necessary. (Cheers.) Blindly and recklessly our Government are plunging into the disasters so carefully prepared for them and for the British Empire. (Hear, hear). They have discovered to be some constitution of the disasters as carefully prepared for them and for the British Empire. (Hear, hear.) They have alienated our own allies in Europe--the great peace league of Germany, Austria, and Italy. They have based their policy with regard to Turkey upon an alliance with our hereditary rivals and focs, France and Russia. (Hear, hear.) The British Government is being led by the nose to harrass and treat unjustly the Ottoman people by the very Powers that are now scheming and plotting against British interests in every quarter of the globe. (Cheers.) Was there ever such gross inepitude as that shown by Anglo-Armenian agitators and by the British Government, which is allowing the policy of a great country to be dictated by the ignorant and fanatical prejudices of a band of irresponsible crocheteers. Treat the Sultan and the Turks with fairness and with justice. It you think that they have done wrong, speak to them in the language of allies and of friends, and I believe the Sultan and the Turks will only be too glad to take our advice. (Cheers.) But do not believe that the Turks advice of Great Britain are so foolish as to follow the advice of Great Britain when they see Great Britain led by the nose by powers that are not only the here litary foes of England and of English - lave seen these men strting by the road-ille feeling the poor the Mahommedan faith. (Loud cheers.) I say that there never was such gross inaptitude shown by any Government as to allow the policy of our great country to be dictated by the ignorant and I also stated that as chief of the Stafford House Committee at fanatical prejudices of a band of irresponsible crocheteers. I have felt bound to speak as I have spoken to-night, because I believe that the alliance of Turkey will prove before long to be necessary for the maintenance of the greatness of our Importal power. (Conters) I believe that it is most inexpedient on our part to create a feeling in the minds of the 90,000,000 of Mahommedan subjects of the Queen that there is no truth, nor honour, nor justice for them in the British press or before British audiences. But I am actuated by higher motives even than these, which, though just motives, may be discarded as motives of expediency. I am guided by the determination that, so far, at least, as my humble power goes, the same justice shall be mated out to Mussulmans by Christians as is demanded by Christians from Mussulmans. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

Mrs. M. T. Keep, of New York, U.S.A., having addressed the meeting in support of the resolution, the latter was again read and carried unanimously.

Moulvi Syed Skerfuddin Ahmad then proposed the second resolution in the following terms : --

"That this meeting protests against the wholesale inputations of ract this meeting process against the wholes the have been levelled against the Sultan of Turkey, and the Turkish army, without any authentic evidence of their truth, and before the Commission appointed by the Sultan to investigate into the alleged atrocities carried on in the Sassun district, on which Commission there are three European members, has made us

He said that his responsibility in reading and moving this resolution lay in the fact that so tar only one side of this question had been put before the British public. (Cheers.) To an onlooker who knows nothing of the Eistern question it would seem that the Turks were actuated by a feeling to exterminate and annihilate the Armenians. This he said they denied in toto. We should bear in mind that when the Turks were in a position to annihilate their Christian subjects with impunity, and when Europe dated not raise its voice, whatever they did, they never thought of having recourse to any such measures. It is therefore an insult to common sense to suggest that they were actuated by such a spirit now that have enemies within and without. All the incriminating articles which have so far appeared have emanated from Armenian sources, and the Turkish aspect of the question has nian sources, and the factor of the fittish public. (Cheers.) When this has been done, then will be the time to pronounce judgment. Agitators have been at work in Armenia, mening the population Agriators have been at work in Armenia, meeting the population to rise; and rebellions are not put down with rose water; they must be put down by force. (Cheers.) It said that they here to-night represented no insignificant portion of the British Empire, and they had a right to raise their voice when they saw thousands of their dumb co-religionists innjustly treated, and their religion insulted at public meetings in England. Those who ery out about the duties of England to Armenia should not forget the duty they owe to their subjects in India. If injustice is done to Turkey they will henceforth lose all faith in England, and believe we are too much under the influence of the bigoted narrow-minded priests, whose chief aim is to keep Christendom Admiral of the Fleet, Sir J. Edmund Commercil, V.C., G C.B.,

Mr. Chairman, Lidies and Grutlemen, - Phere is one thing this meeting may be preity well certain of, that, in consequence of Canon McCall's letter to the Times of the day before yesterday, it is not his intention immediately to hoise his flig in the Mediterraneau fleer, bombard Smyrna and the rest of Arabia, depose the Sultan, and become King of Armenia himself. He is going to put that off wrote a letter to the Times, a letter which his been considerably criticised by many people, but I am hippy to say from the letters which I have received, favourably criticised. This letter has excit ed the anger of the Canon. I stated mere facts; I stated that I had had a great deal of experience---practical experience, nor theoretical---for thirty years in Turkev and in Asia Minor; that for over eight months out of that time I had been in the close t possible connection with a Firstish army of 30,000 mm, and that I found them the most orderly, excellent, kindly, charitable people that I ever came across. (Loud cheers.) It has been described in one of these penny-a-liners that Turkish soldiers were in the habit of carrying babies about on their bayonets. Well, gentlemen, I told Canon McCall, who no doubt had read the Tones (and my letter was pretty well discussed), that I said in that letter that my experience was that in place of carrying babies about on their bayonets, that I had seen these poor fellows, who are very very hard Gallipoli, I had gone round the hospitals every day and had seen the poor wounded Turks, and to see those men, to see the look of gratitude which they had on their faces, to see them as you went round clasp your hand and make the salaam, and by every motion and every look of their eyes tell you that they blessed you for the kindness that you were doing for them. (Cheers.) This also en-raged Canon McCall---he did not like it at all. Well, now, gentlemen, I believe Canon McCall to be nothing more nor less than a rampaging political priest. (Loud cheers.) It is an old game he is carrying on, this abominable crusade against the Mussulmans and against their religion. (Hear, hear.) Now I like to be a little practical, I like to explain to you how these lies keep about. Now we are told there is a Mr. Green, who has published a book. I must tell you that about one-half of the book is taken up wholly and solely by extracts from the newspapers. Well, you know, it does not appear to me that that is quite the right way to make a does not appear to me that that is quite the right way to make a book; I think if you take a cutting out of a newspaper you should put at the end of it, "The Times, 15th April," or "The Daily Teligraph, 16th March," that is my idea. (Hear, hear). Well, now, this is one of the things that he states in his book, page 21:--"The Pedik read the Sultan's firman for extermination, and then, hanging the document on his breast, exhorted the soldiers not to be found wanting in their duty." Now, that is pretty explicit, is it not? Now, on the next page I suppose he must have forgotten it. This is what appears:—"And so ended the massacre, for the timely arrival of the Commander-in-Chief of the 4th Army Corps from Erzinghan saved a few of the prisoners' lives and prevented the extermination of four more villages." What I want to know is, how could he be there at the beginning of the massacre, read the Sultan's firman, and carry it on his breast if he did not arrive at Sassun until all was over. Now, I could keep you till the middle of the night---which I have not intention of doing --- if I read to you all the contradictory reports from this book of Mr. Green, and from the latest very gentlemanly production of Mr.

Canon McCall. (Laughter.) Now he has published a book, in which he gave me three pages. Well, I think he must have been sery angry with me to have given me three pages out of a not very large book. (Laughter and cheers.) But I will tell you what he does. He tells you in the book that he does got dislike the Turks, that he does not dislike the Mahommedans, but in the preceding pages he dares to tell you the most filthy, monstrous accusations against the Turks. On what authority? On the authority of an against the Tulks. On what authority: On the authority of an Englishman, but he does not give his name, and on the authority of a Turkish teacher. (Shame.) Well, we know perfectly well that Canon McCall had from first to last said that the Turk was not to be believed on his oath. Why then should this Turkish teacher he believed on his oath, when says something which is too horrible to mention? (Hear, hear.) But, gentlemen, all I can say is this; I should strongly advise Canon McCall to do as we do sometimes at sea, when a man makes use of foul language; we wash his mouth out with a basin of salt water. (Laughter and cheers.)

The gentleman who proposed this resolution made a statement which I can absolutely affirm is correct. I have been in Constantinople a great many times in my life. I was there only a few months ago. I remained there for three weeks and determined to had out to the best of my ability the truth of the statements. I went to a man whom Mr. Green calls in his book a man of great repute and who knows everything about this question. I said, "Mr. So-and-so (I could give you his name, but as I did not ask him whether I might quote him I will not do so. This gentleman had been there for 35 years, and he has been in Armenia and knows everything about Armenia) "will you tell me the facts of the case." He said, "Admiral, there would be no revolutionary work going on ""Oh, no," I said, "that is a little too much." "Yes," he said, "England." "But," I said, "do you mean to tell me that that very respectable Society, the Angle-Armenian Committee, is resolutionary? Why, I accused them of it the other day and they wrote me letters-- certainly they were all marked 'private' so that I could not publish them--declaring they were nothing of the kind." (Cheers and laughter.) He said, "Admiral, there are two revolutionary societies in England, one the Anglo-Armenian Society and the other the Armenian Patriotic Society. The Anglo-Armenian Society contains one or two names of gentlemen who are far above revolutionary measures, but they have got one or two black sheep on the committee, and these black sheep have been in communication from first to last with the other revolutionary societies, and are the persons who have been inciting these poor people to rebel."
(Shame.) Well, the funny thing about the whole matter is that I think they must have discovered that lately, because I notice that on the Anglo-Armenian Committee one or two of these gentlemen have ceased to appear, and I have no doubt in my own mind that that society is an absolutely revolutionary society, like those at Tiflis, those at Varna, those at Athens, and those at Paris. (Hear, hear.) They have been inciting these poor wretches to rebel, and we know very well what it is when you begin to shoot troops down, when you begin to kill policemen who are sent to get the taxes, and there is not blood caused, we do not know what may follow. (Hear, are doing so. Friend Peck.

hear.) That there may have been a good many men killed is very probable. I believe there have. I see in the papers to-day they have found those two pits at last. Anything more dreadful! Why, gentlemen, the Turkish Government have never denied for one single moment that there were a certain number of men killed one single moment that there were a certain number of men artied in action. Well, when these men are killed, where on earth are you going to bury them unless they are put in pits? (Cheers.)

Well, now, I am not going to keep you any longer, but all I am going to say is this: for God's sake let the English people remember that one of the great attributes which we claim is justice. (Loud Cheers.) Justice for the Christian, justice for the Mahomwhom we have any communication with. (Cheers.) We have no right whatever to express an opinion about these things until the Commission which was accepted by the English Government has reported. When that Commission has reported, when they have seen what has been done, when they point out the justification of what has been done, then, gentlemen, it is time for us to speak. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. A. M. K. Dehlvi had seconded the Resolution, which was now carried nom. con.

Mr. S. J. Meerza then moved the third resolution, as follows ;-"That this meeting protests against the gross injustice with which atrocious crimes charged against Mussulmans on mere hearsay evidence and wholly unproved, have been recklessly assumed to be true, while the greater misdeeds of Christian powers committed upon Mussulmans are passed over without condemnation or rebuke."

A gentleman of Liverpool seconded the resolution. that he tried to obtain a hearing at the meeting in St. James' Hall, but failed, supported it, and the resolution was carried unanimously.

The meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman and cheers for His Majesty the Sultan.

He navises persons of innited means who would like to become small landholters to emigrate to New Zealand.

Still, he reminds us that in the end we must pay for what we get "The calling of a prospector, for instance," said Mr. Peck, "is full of hard work. Besides, it entals rough living, such as salt junk, saddened damper, with tea in buckefus. One must have the digestive capacity of an ostuch or an anaconda to stand that det for long. It must therefore be taken as proof of the good machinery inside of my system.

of an ostitich of an anacound to stand that det to long. It must therefore be taken as proof of the good machinery inside of my system, when I mention that I actually stood it for nearly twenty-five years.

"My punishment was delayed, you see, but it didn't fail. At last the climax time, and I was posturated with agonissing pain in the stomach and all the other symptoms of a perfound derangement of all the distance of the proof of all the stomach. the digestive organs. I had to knock off work and cease all exertion I was submed with disgust with all things minimane. I believe that dyspepsia is responsible for a large portion of the world's suicides !"

Mr. Peck's conjecture is executy parallel with the fact as set forth in the official statistics of all civilised countries. No other disease so demonstress and depresses human nature. It attacks the secret strongholds of the reason and drives people insane; it stippelies the sensibilities; it must men and women into selfish, useless, nursance; it impels them to commit crime. All this in addition to their own desolation and then to commence the All this in addition to their awn desolation and suffering. Yes, Mr. Peck is quite right.

But to get back to what he says about himself. At the advice of a firend—Mr. W. Williams of this place I began to take the far-famed Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. What result did it have? Pil tell you: It has transformed me from a prematurely old man into one quite egenerated.

Lam a rapid eater and can't break myself of the bad habit. Hence I make it a point to keep a bottle by me always and an occasional dose when necessary to set me right.

when necessary to set the right.

"I can safely assert that the investment of 7/6 in Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup was the best I ever made in all my chequered career You may depend that I prescribe this medicine to all and sundry people. ron may depend that I preserve this interests on a more squery people I come in contract with. Prior to using it I spent pounds at different times, but only got partial relief. Syrup scenis to make straight for this seal of the trouble. I pen these lines just to show other sufferers the way out. There are any number of respectable persons here who can attest the truth of what I have written.—Respectfully (Signed) WM. BROMFIELD PECK, Russell, Bay of Islands, New Zenlund, July 2nd. 1802.

We don't call for witnesses. Mr. Peck's tale is farnkness and truth itself. We hold but our hand in greeting across the sea. Dyspepsis a living death, and Mother Seigel gives new life. Millions sing that chorus. But he had better eat slower. Write again and tell us you itself.

THE RAJPUT LEGEND OF JAGDEV PARMAR.
(FROM THE RAS MALA.)

BY A. ROGERS, BO.C.S.

"Oh, arbiters of Destmy l" then Jagdev cried ;

" To turn you from your mood is there no way,

No sacrifice by which his precious life

May yet be rescued for his people's good?"

They answered: "If some other chief, whose rank Is equal to the king's, would give his life

In place of his, then Sidh Raj would be saved."

" Let me then go," said Jagdev : " if my wife Give her consent, my life shall be for his."

Scornfully the Fates then answered : " Where the wife

Who for a king would make such sacrifice?"

But Jagdev went and the king followed close.

The tale was told to Virmati, who cried :

Oh! happy chance the gods to us afford To prove a Rajput's fealty to his salt!

But there is one petition that I crave.

I can not live without thee. Let me, too.

For Sidh Raj Jesangh offer up my life!"

But Jagdev said : " Our children who shall keep ?"

And Virmati said quickly: " Let us all

Offer ourselves; this to the gods, no doubt,

Will be a far more pleasing sacrifice."

Taking their children by the hand, they went

Out to the Fates, and close behind the king

Still followed wonderingly, although unseen.

Then Jagdev asked the Fates : " How many years

Will ye increase the king's life for my head?"

They answered : " Twelve." " There are here three lives,

Those of my wife and children, that should bear

An equal value with my own. For all

How many lives will ye vouchsafe the king?"

" For each twelve years," they answered: " forty-eight."

After one last embrace Virmati gave

Her well-loved first-born to his sire, who struck

Off from its lovely form that tender head.

Then did the Chavati with streaming eyes

Offer the second to his father's sword.

But: "Hold! Enough!" The Fates their mandate gave.

"Your loyalty before man have ye shown,

DEAFNESS COMPLETELY CURED! Any person suffering from Deafness, Noises in the Head, &c., may learn of a new, simple treatment, which is proving very successful in completely curing cases of all kinds. Full particulars, including many unsolicited testimonials and newspaper press notices, will be sent post free on application. The system is, without doubt, the most successful ever brought before the public. Address, Aural Specialist, Albany Buildings, 39, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S. W.

And no more need the gods. The precious boon That ye demanded, Sidh Raj Jesangh's life, This, with thy children and thy wife, we grant, And to the king give eight and forty years To rule a happy and contented folk." Then tenderly they raised the offered child, And poured ambrosia on him and he lived, Then Virmati and Jagdev with their babes Went happy homewards. From behind the clouds The moon broke forth and lighted up their path, Smiling upon them, as the gods in Paradise Talked to each other of their noble deed. The king, too, sought his palace and his bed, And meditated farther trial of their faith. With morning's dawn came Jagdev to his watch. But not before those sluggards of the night, Who had not done their duty, had been asked Why had the women wailed and sung for joy. Lying they answered that one set of wives - Minered for a son by death just snutched away. And to the other set, who sang for joy, The gods had given a long-expected 'seir. Then turning round to Jagdev Sidh Raj asked What he had seen. He modestly replied : "It must be even as the chiefs have said." The king rejoined : " Nay, I have seen it all. Do thon now tell the file as it occurred," And Jagdev spoke once more : " It is enough. That all is known unto the king himself." Then Sidh Raj cried : " Brothers and nobles, hear, And in your hearts consider well the tale. The first watch of this day had seen my death ; The Fates of Delhi would have borne me off, Had not this Raiput and his noble wife Offered their own and both their children's lives A sacrifice for me, to save my life. One of the children had been offered up To add on twelve years to my worthless life. But merciful the Fates restored it back, Well pleased to know a Rajput's zeal and faith. For each of four lives twelve years they bestow. These are the Rajputs at whose paltry pay Ye grumbled, casting on it longing eyes. Who when I bade you go forth and enquire What meant those cries unwonted that I heard, Cared not to leave your beds of ease, and brave Yourselves the dangers of the night and storm, And now have basely lied to hide your shame. What was there in the pay? Such service rare, Ten thousand had I given, and not two, Sufficient recompense had not received." Thenceforth on Jagdev Sidh Raj Jesangh looked As on his equal in the realm, and gave One of his daughters to him as a wife.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

And Virmati was quite content. She said It was becoming for a Rajput lord More than one wife to have upon the earth That when they mounted on his funeral pyre, As Sates burning, he in Paradise Might be right rayally attended, too. They lived at Pattan many happy years, And when the gods called Udyadit away, Jagdev succeeded him as king of Dhar. -The Imperial and Asiatic Quarterly Review.

WEEKLYANA.

THE inhabitants of Dover will present the Marquess of Dofferin and Ava with a life-size portrait of himself to be painted by Prince Troubetzkov.

IN London, out of 100 widawers who marry, twelve marry their house-

LAST year, the electors in the United Kingdom numbered 6,268,791. The last return just issued shows that there are 4,959,805 electors in England and Wales, 636,097 in Scotland, and 736,552 in Ireland, or a total of 6,332,454.

A SUICIDE in Birmingham justified his conduct thus: "I was not asked to come to this world, and I don't see why I should consult any one when or how I should leave it." The verdict on the death wassuicide while insane.

EARLY in this month, the Hungerford Parish Church joined as man and wife, James Thring Coxe, of Newton Lodge, verging upon eighty, and Radbourne, aged eighteen years. The wedding is reported, in the English papers, as of a remarkable character. It is, we suppose, because a man who has exceeded the allotted span of life, with one foot in his grave, leads to the altar a girl with the world before her. Yet the union was a matter of choice for both the parties. In a country where widow marriage is permitted, the case is not so hard for the girl, as we in this country may imagine.

IT was a wonder, indeed, which St. Louis witnessed, the wedding of Miss Pauline Devere, hailing from Chester, an animal trainer in Wombwell's Circus, and Harry Bishop, a cowboy, in the lions' cage, with six animals acting as bridesmands and best man. The report says that "Justice Zimmerman performed the ceremony, at the conclusion of which bride and groom emerged from the cage and received the hearty congratulations of the keepers and the curious crowd," The craving for the curious and the sensational supports the tiger or the lion tainer in his desperate profession. We hope the congratulations of the crowd were more substantial. The marriage, we take it, was a part of the performance of the company.

THE Lieutenant-Governor leaves Daijeeling for Calcutta on the 2nd July and arrives at Sealdah on Wednesday, the following day. He will be accompanied by only the Private Secretary, Captain Currie. Under the circumstances, it is needless to say that both the departure and arrival will be private. Two days after, on Saturday, the 6th July, there will be a sitting of the Bengal Legislative Council.

MR. David Robert Lyall, Member of the Board of Revenue, and Mr. James Austin Bourdillon, Officiating Commissioner of the Burdwan Division, have been re-appointed members of the Bengal Legislative Council. The appointments of Babu Surendranath Banerjee and Mr. John Gilham Wamack are also gazetted.

MR. W. E Gordon Leith having taken leave, Mr. C. E. Gray, Barrister-at-Law, will act as Assistant Secretary to the Government of Bengal, in the Legislative Department.

Magistrates. We quote it entire:—

"Officers holding the sole-charge Cantonment Magistracies entered in the list appended to the Resolution No. 9-Judicial 774-784, dated the 18th July 1894, were, by the orders contained in that Resolution, formed mit on Imperial service under the Government of India. It is therefore necessary to lay down a definite rule regulating the confirmation of officers officiating in the Department.

2. The Governor General in Council is accordingly pleased to direct that the claims of Officiating Cautonment Magistrates to substantive appointments shall in future be considered by the Government of India in the order in which they entered the Department, irrespective of the Province in which they are serving or in which the vacancy occurs. In accordance with this ruling, when a vacancy takes place in consequence of the death, retirement, etc., of a sole-charge Cautonment Magistrate in one Province, the vacancy will ordinarily be the officer who has had the longest officiating service in the Department, irrespective of the Province in which he has been so officiating, provided that he is considered by the Local Government under which he is serving, and by the military authorities, to be deserving of confirmation. It will not, however, follow that he will be transferied to the particular cationnitien in which the vacancy has occurred. The principle enunciated in the Resolution of the 18th July 1894, that local knowledge and experience should be made use of, as fat as possible, will be kept in view, and, in puisuance of this principle, it may at any time be found necessary to place the cantoninent vacated in the manner referred to in charge of an officiating officer having local experience. The distribution of the 18th July 1894, that Government of Administration under which they are serving and, as was minimated in paragraph 5 of the Resolution of the 18th July 1894, the Government of Administration under which they are serving and, as was infinited in paragraph 5 of the Resolution of the 18th July 1894, the Government of India will not make transfers from one Province to another without consulting the Local Governments concerned."

THE Bengal Government has revised the rules for the payment of the expenses of complainants and witnesses attending the criminal courts. For such purpose, Natives are divided into three classes-ordinary labouring class, natives of higher rank in life, and natives of superior rank. Their diet allowances are fixed at two annas, four annas, and up to Rs. 3 per diem respectively. The rates of travelling allowance are-third class, intermediate class, and second class railway fares. If there is a distinction among the Natives, there is none among Europeans, who are all equal and equal to Natives of higher rank in life.

MR. R. L. Upton has been permitted to resign the appointment of Solicitor to Government, Calcutta. Mr. W. K. Eddis succeeds hun.

THE Governor-General in Council has declared that summonses issued by any Civil or Revenue Court in the Baroda State, may be sent to the Courts in British India and served as if they had been issued by such ONE Deokaran, a bunnia of Jubbulpore, has been found, by the Deputy Commissioner, guilty of forging a bond of ten rupees, and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. In 1893, he was, for a similar offence, sent to jail for one year.

THE young Chief of Patna, in the Chhatesgarh Division of the Cential Provinces, shot his young wife to death and then killed himself. He had been a student in the Rajkumar School and was only installed Maharaja in January last year.

NOTES & LEADERETTES.

OUR OWN NEWS,

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS.

LORD Rosebery has gone out and Lord Salisbury has come in. In the House of Commons, on June 21, during the debate on the Army Estimates, Mr. Brodrick moved an amendment protesting against the inadequacy of reserves of ainmunition. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Secretary of State for War, contested the remarks of the member for Guildford. On a division, the Government was defeated by seven votes, the figures being one hundred and thirty-two and one hundred and twenty-five. The result was received with the most profound astonishment even among the Opposition. Sir Charles Dilke, Colonel Nolan, and all the Unionists voted with the majority. A Cabinet Council assembled immediately. Another was held the next day in the morning, which, after occupying two and-a-half hours, was adjourned until the afternoon, when the sitting lasted another two hours. It is stated that as Mr. Campbell Bannetman maintained that reserves of ammunition were ample, he looked upon the result of the division as impugning his veracity. In the House of Commons, on June 24, Sir William Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer, made an offical explanation. He declared that the Ministry entirely shared the responsibility of the attitude adopted by the Secretary of State for War, and the result of the division practically amounted to a vote of censure which compelled the Government to resign. Lord Rosebery made a similar statement in the House of Lords.

Lord Rosebery went to Windsor to place before Her Majesty the resignation of the Government, which was accepted. Lord Salisbury was summoned to form a Ministry. After conferring with his colleagues he proceeded again to Windsor, where in an audience with the Queen he formally accepted office, and kissed her Majesty's hand.

The following posts in the new Ministry have been filled as under :-Lord Salisbury, Premier and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Lord Halsbury, Lord High Chancellor.

The Duke of Devoushire, Lord President of the Council.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Mr. Balfour, First Lord of the Treasury and Leader of the House of Communs.

Mr. Chamberlam, Secretary of State for the Colomes.

Mr. Henry Chaplin, President of the Local Government Board. The Cabinet will comprise seventeen or eighteen persons. But it 14 all temporary. On the 27th, Lord Salisbury stated in the House of Lords that the policy of the Government was to dissolve Parliament at the earliest possible moment. He hoped the necessary business would be finished in time to dissolve on the 8th or 9th of July.

MR CHAMBERLAIN has issued his election address, in which he declares that the Unionists are absolutely agreed to discard the wild constitutional changes planned by the late Government, to devote their attention to constructive social reform and to safeguard the defensive resources of the Empire. The election addresses rendered necessary from those members who have accepted office in the new Ministry agree in deferring any exposition of policy until the general election.

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deafness, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VICTORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

MR. Labouchere and the other Radicals who follow his leadership do not intend, they say, to offer any obstruction to the closing business of the Session, but only desire Parliament to be dissolved as promptly

THE Times points out that the Duke of Devoushire will have the special duty of presiding over the Committee of the National and Imperial Defence, combining both the Admiralty and the War Office naw constituted for the first time.

A MANIFESTO has been issued by Mr. Justin McCarthy as leader of the anti-Parnellites pointing out that the worst enemies of Ireland have attained to power. The manifesto also appeals for funds in carry on a campaign at the approaching elections.

PRIOR to the vote on Mr. Brodrick's amendment, the Secretary of State for War announced that the Duke of Cambridge would resign the appointment of Commander-in-Chief on the 1st of October next. In the course of his speech Mr. Campbell-Bannerman highly eulogised the services of the Dake, and also declared that it was not proposed to abolish the office of Commander-in-Chief, but that the functions appertaining thereto would be greatly modified, and the post would only be tenable for a certain term of years. It has been decided that the new Commander-in-Chief, with the Adjutant-General, Quartermaster-General, Director of Artillery, and Inspector-General of Fortifications, shall form a Council, whose duty it will be to advise the Secretary of State for War on all matters relating to the Army.

SIR Arthur Haliburton has been appointed premanent Under-Secretary of State for War in succession to Sir Ralph Thompson, who is

THE arrangements about the Russo-Chinese Ioan have collapsed, China objects to pledge her Customs revenue to Russia, as she fears that later on, on that security, a larger loan will be issued in all the markets of Europe and America.

A CONVENTION has been signed at Pekin, settling the boundaries and commercial relation between Yunan and Tonguin. One of the clauses permits the introduction of railways and telegraphs. The treaty concluded between France and Clima virtually supersedes the projected Buffer State in regard to Siam.

THE Porte is becoming greatly disquieted by the growing agitation in Macedonia in favour of the introduction of reforms supplated for in the Treaty of Berlin. A Macedonian journal reports that a revolution has broken out at three points. The relations between Turkey and Bulgaria are strained, owing to the former warning the latter to abstain from taking part in the agitation in Macedonia.

A RESOLUTION was moved in the Italian Parliament by the Extreme Left for the appointment of a Committee of Inquity to report on the conduct and acts of Signor Crispi, who made an eloquent speech in his defence, declaring that he would refuse to submit to any tribunal. The motion was rejected by a majorny of 168 votes.

KABAREGA, a powerful Chief in Univoro, continues to maintain a defiant attitude, and to threaten British posts. News has been received that severe fighting took place on March 3, in which Captain Donning was killed and Major Cunningh un severely wounded. The latter, however, is recovering. The despatch does not state the result of the fighting.

THE Duke of Aosta was married to the Princess Helene of Oileans at Kingston in full French royal state. The spectacle was of a most brilliant description. Fifty English and Foreign Princes and Princesses were present at the ceremony. The town was fully decorated and was thronged with spectators.

THE programme of the National Liberal Federation includes Home Rule, the reform of the Lords, and the Welsh Disestablishment Bill.

THE International Railway Congress was opened on Wednesday by the Prince of Wales.

THE Daily News states that Mr. Fowler had decided upon the evacuation of Chitral, but that owing to the change of Government a reversal of the policy is now possible.

It was a happy bit of the Municipal Loan Committee to fix the rate of interest of the new 18 lakhs loan at 4, instead of going down to 3½. The tenders at par and upwards amounted to Rs. 1,28 47,600. The lowest rate of render accepted was Rs. 106, the highest Rs. 111. Tenders at Rs. 106 t and opwards were accepted in full, while those at Rs. 106 will be distributed property.

The question of a diobikhama for Calcutta has been revived. On Thirsday, at the adjourned meeting of the Commissioners, a committee was appointed to draw up a scheme for the purpose. It is some time that the Caminissioners, following Bombay, had decided to wash the clothes, as they remove the nightsoil. The total initial cost was estimated at Rs 66,000 and the working expenses at Rs 6,300 per annium. The site was purchased for Rs, 30,000, and then the matter allowed to drop. There was a show of opposition from the subinban Commissioners, but the proposition was carried by a large majority. The recent prosecution of a dholi for spreading infection seems to have spurred the Commissioners to the Resolution. The Dholi missance is great, indeed. The Commissioners will deserve the thanks of the comminity of they can remove the evil of a dilatory dholi.

A COMMITTEE was also appointed to report on the dairies or places in which cows and buffatoes are kept within the town and suburbs, for the supply of milk. Towards the close of the discussion that followed the motion, the Chairman said that there were some six hundred cowsheds in Calcutta, few of which were licensed. Hundreds of cattle were sometimes haddled together in a place with hardly a standing space for them all. He knew of places where it was necessary to carry a lantern during the day not to distinguish between the good and the bad but to discover the very existence of the animals. True, the Municipal Act empowered him to close such places. But the power was not enforceable. It would not do to let loose a number of cattle on the streets. What was to be their ultimate destination? He had spoken to Mr. Pearson. If the Honorary Magistrates, like the Chief Magistrate, would heavily punish the keepers, the sheds would quickly improve. Supposing, Mr. Pearson sent all of them to jail, would the sheds be palaces? The law (Sec. 286) says all " stables and cow-houses, shall be under the survey and control of the Commissioners as regards their site, material, dimensions and construction, and shall be altered, supplied with water, connected with a sewer, paved, repaired, kept in proper order, stopped up, or demolished, at the costs and charges of the owner;" and if he "neglect, during eight days after notice in writing, to execute the work in the manner required by the Commissioners, the Commissioners may cause the work to be executed; and the expenses thereby incurred shall be paid by the owner." The Commissioners could not desire for more power. Yet the cowsheds are a disgrace to the town and a cinelly to the animals. Instead of exercising the power quoted, the Commissioners usually prosecute the men for keeping the sheds unclean. Even if they are heavily fined, they find it still profitable not to apply for licenses which are costly. Not that heavy fees are claimed, but the costs of improvement demanded are out of all proportion to the income derivable from the trade. Here hes the difficulty. If reforms at moderate outlay could be made, the sheds would have considerably improved by this time. At the present time, minicipal prosecutions are confined chiefly to outlding without permission or not in accordance with sanctioned plan

WE were deeply grieved to learn of the death of Dewan Haridas Viharidas Desai. He will be best remembered in these Provinces and out of India as a member of the Royal Commission on Opium of 1893. He might, if he chose, have been more widely known and much earlier. But he hated notoriesty. We wrote of him only in February last, when on his retirement from the Dewanship of Jinagad, he was presented with a khilat worth Rs. 25,000 and granted a monthly pension of Rs. 500.

Deway Salieb Haridas is an inhabitant of Charutur in Guzerat. His home is at Nadiad, in Zilla Kaira. He is 55 years of age and will be best remembered by our readers as a member of the Opinia Commission of 1893. Coming of a family above want, he was in no hurry to take to service. At the age of 32, he was Nawadish and afterwards auditor at Bhawnugger, where he remained for 5 years and four months. Next he was State Karbari at Wadhan for about the same period. Wakanir then wanted his services. The Raja was then just dead leaving a minor 3 or 4 years ald. He stayed there as Manager for a year, when the Maharaja of Idar-a branch of the House of Jodhpur, otherwise known as Nani Maiwar-attaining majority, appointed Mr. Haridas his Dewan. After a stay there of 14 months, be transferred his services to the Mahonledan principality of Junagad, where he did excellent service for ten long years. A man of no ambition, strictly conscientious, and wishing to pass his latter years in the comforts of home, he took one year's leave preparatory to retirement. When that leave expired he tendered his resignation. It was not, however, accepted, and he was allowed another year's furlough. It was during this period that he joined the Royal Commission. While he was still enjoying his second leave, after the close of the work on the Commission, he was recalled to his daties in the Innagad Dorbar, as the acting Dewan, whose services were lent by the British Government, too was recalled to join his permanent post in the British service. The Nawab pressed his Dewan to remain with him till such time as he could find a competent man. The Dewan Saheb, grateful for the consideration shewn him and full of sense of responsibility, had his leave cancelled and rejoined the post from which he has just retired with such honour and dignity. The provision made in his retirement is highly honourable to his moster the Nawab.

Mr. Haridas Viharidas Desai is a jewel of a man-simple and unassuming, with the instincts of patriarchal days, gentlemanly feelings, without the vices of Western education, pleasant and agreeable, with a fitted of information to instruct and amuse. He may well be proud of having served his country well.'

The Dewan breathed his last early on the morning of Monday, the 17th June. He had just returned from a visit to Junagad, on the mvitation of the Vizier Scheb, after a stay there of a fortnight. When he went to and came back from Junagad, he was quite hale and hearty, After a week, he had an attack of slight fever which he did not much mind. It continued for three days. On the fourth day, quite unexpectedly his temperature rose to 104°. Still he was the same jolly good soul that he always had been. On Sunday, he seemed to be well, for he could write to his distant friends. He was tash perhaps to take his bath that day. In the afternoon, the fever began to rise and rose to 107. Up to 6 P.M., he was perfectly conscious and wore his winning smile, replying to inquiries. Then he fell into a calmness which seemed to be sleep, but it was the sleep of death. In death, as in life, he was all peace. Heaven is assuredly his. In his last moments, he expressed no anxiety about hunself or those near and dear to him He leaves behind bim two daughters and two sons, the elder of the two last being only six years of age. He leaves them in no want and leaves for them a guardian, which he had trained up, in his nephew Me Giridherdas Mangaldas Desai. The death is a terrible blow to him He has all our sympathy in his great beleavement.

All Nadiad was in incorning on the 17th. All the schools were closed and business suspended.

Baboo Stanath Das, of the Jan Bazar Mar family, died of fever, on the morning of Monday. He had taken an interest in the affairs of the city in the early days of the present elective numicipality, and was returned a Commissioner. Latterly, with the partition, by her grandsons of the estates of the late Rain Rashmani, he devoted himself entirely to the improvement of his own estate, unmindful of the claims on him of friends and the public. He was, the famous Baboo Jadoo Nail Chowdby excepted, the best educated of the grandsons of the Ran who have inherited her estates.

NATIVE Bombay, assembled at Haji Omar Jamai's Locksley Hall has decided to send a letter of condolence to Mr. Vincent, the Polic Commissioner, on the death of his wife. We had expected Bombai would do more for Mrs. Vincent. It is, however, not yet too late for the Deputy Commissioner to move at least his own men to comforward with a better appreciation of the virtues of the deceased late in the form of a permanent memorial.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE at Nami-Tal as not safe as a Governor's residence should be. Ugly cracks and fissures having appeared, the house and hill were subjected to special examination. The first report, dated the 27th March, 1895, says :

" It is impossible to admit that the present state of the Government "It is impossible to admit that the present state of the Government House is satisfactory, or that from the point of view of enames step it is suitable for occupation by the Head of the Lord Government during a season of excessive rainfall. Without going so fat as to say that there is probability of a disaster, the Committee are constanted at express their opinion that in view of the constant settling and cracking which has been seen to happen every rainy season, and of the marked increase in the width and extent of the cracks during the goals season of 180.1 a serious acculent any at a many constant of the cracks. the marked increase in the width and extent of the cracks during the past season of 1894, a serious accident may, at any time after the beginning of the range season, be brought about by some sudden structural fadure within the building itself. On this view of the question and with special reference to the point on which the opinion of the Committee was specially called for, viz. "whether the limit has been reached beyond which it would be foolish to remain," they consider that it would be advisable for the house to be vacated during the rans of them."

Another report was called for in April following. It is re-assuring "The Committee are of apiaion that Government House is at present structurally safe, and may continue to be occupied as a resid His Honour the Lieutenani-Governor."

Mr. R. D. Oidham, Superintendent, Geological Survey of India, takes a despondent view of the entire situation. He considers that "the sile of Government House, apart from any question of the stability of the structure, must aheady be regarded as unsafe during the rams." He thinks "it is not outside the bounds of possibility that with a full monsoon a slip may take place within the present year, and in any case movement is to be anticipated to an extent which would make the house undestrable if not unsafe, for its inhabitants."

In the Dinapore punkah coalie case, the Magistrate committed Private George Haward, of the Manchester Regiment, to the Calcutta sessions, on charges of murder, and voluntarily causing grievous hurt by a dangerous weapon. He was tried by Mi. Justice Norris with a special jury. Mr. O'Kinealy, Standing Counsel, prosecuted. Messrs. C. F. Batrow and W. H. Kingut dete uded the prisoner. After a trial of three days, the majority of the jury -eight to one-found Howard not guilty, and the Judge discharged him. The prisoner had voluntially admitted to the Magistrate that "The punkah coole was lying in the verandan with his head towards the swall. I kicked him on the head with my boots and went to the theatre at 9 20. I kicked him at 9 15; there was blood on my boots. I threw them away. No one saw me do it. I believe the man died from the kick. I'ms I believe is the whole truth. I am making into statement of my own free will. I told Private Gardner and Private Donnerry miniediatery afterwards." The jury were probably swayed by, the medical evidence of the native Civil Surgeon who thought that the death could not be due to a kick from a heavy boot; the wound of which the cooke died must have been produced by a heavy must instrument such as the club produced in court. The defending coursel Mr. Barow tried to explain away the prisoner's brave and manny confession as too manly to shield a contrade. The counsel was not as manty. He would, in spite of his cirent's confession, fasten the guilt of death on the comrade Donnelly. The confession itself, he argued, was not sufficient to base a decision of guilty upon in such a serious charge. The Judge left it to the judy to decide whether the prisoner had kicked a dead man as suggested by Mi-Bairow. It was entirely for them, he said, to say whether Howard's statement was true or not, If they believed that death was caused by the kick admitted by Howard, then they had no reasonable alternative but to find him guilty. He concluded by praying to God to guide the jury in coming to a right decision-The jury, as we have said, were not unanimous. The days are gone by when no verdict could be given effect to when the jurymen disagreed-The Judge evidently agreed with the majority and passed his order accordingly.

THE Sealds. Magistrate has had too much of the potato or plantain whisky. He especially sat early this morning for the last drop. He will unburthen hunself an Tuesday.

THE Rai Bahadoor has not succeeded. The University has elected Mr. A. M. Bose as its representative to the Bengal Council. There was no other candidate.

BUDDHA-IIIS LIFE.

THE religion of Buddha was, if not the first, at least one of the earliest of the man-worshipping and morality-preaching faiths. The Vedic singers who preceded them never claimed to be superior to, or identical with, the gods of their pantheon. Their highest ambition was only to be recognised as men extraordinary powers. Their religion offered chiefly tangible good service, and had not much to do with either the improvement or the corruption of morality. Their success in securing the reverence of men naturally led those who followed them to attempt higher altitudes. Buddha did not, like the later prophets, claim to be an incarnation or agent of the Most High. Ideas of that kind were perhaps unknown to him. At any rate, they did not originate with him. However, he tried to attain the same goal by a different route. He in a manner denied the existence of a Supreme Bramha, and spoke of the lesser gods of the Hindu pantheon as his inferiors. According to his elaboration of the Hindu doctrine of metampsychosis, the condition of a god is the highest stage which every sentient being is capable of attaining before becoming a Buddha or Bodhisatwa. In the Buddhistic scripture we read of a certain frog that, simply listening to Buddha's voice, while reciting the Law, was born as a god in the Trayastrinsa heaven. In some of Buddha's miracles, as for instance in the one relating to his descent from heaven to Sankisa, it is stated that the gods acted as his personal attendants. It is also related that they attended his preachings and reverenced him as a teacher. His policy with regard to the lesser deities of the Hindu pantheon was in fact the same as that of the British Government of the present day towards the Indian princes, and not that of Dilhousie. He did not, like some of the later prophets, aspire to the position of "a lonesome tower" in the midst of a level plain. His religion, therefore, must be said to be a form of Hinduism, and not wholly antagonistic to it.

Though the main facts about the personal history of Buddha are well known, yet it seems worthwhile to condense them that the reader may at once form his own idea of their value and bearing. Buddha was the son of a Kshatriya Chief named Suddhodana, who ruled over a small king-dom at the foot of the Hinalay is, between the rivers Rapti and Rohini. The chief town of the State was Kapilavastu which has been identified with a village named Bhuila in the Basti District, about 25 miles to the north-east of Fyzabad, and 12 miles to the north-west of the town of Basti. Buddha's mother, Mahamaya died on the seventh day after his birth. Although he was taken care of by his mother's sister, Maya alias Gautami Mahaprajapati, who was also one of his father's wives, his domestic life was, in all probability, not a very happy one. In his early years, he received some education under a teacher named Kaucika, and it was perhaps this teacher who awakened in his young mind that craving for the study of the Hindu philosophical systems which seemed to be very strong in his mind when he left his paternal roof. He married three wives, and, according to some accounts, was blessed with a child at the age of twenty-nine years. By other accounts his wife Yasodhara gave birth to Rahula long after his departure from home. In any case, with such intellectual and physical activity as he possessed, the monotony of home life proved extremely irksome to him. Possibly, the fact of his being motherless, and his father having other wives, made him miserable. That he was not a great favourite with the family, appears pretty clearly from the fact that, after his voluntary exile, his father did nothing whatever to bring him back. If, like the late Raja Pratapa Chand of Burdwan, Buddha wanted to test the affection of his father for a motherless child, he was doomed to a sad disappointment, though, for the good name of his father, or to uphold his own prophetic pretensions, he never expressed his feelings. What the real cause of Buddha's renunciation of home was, cannot possibly be known. But there cannot be much doubt that the stories in the Buddhistic scriptures are mere myths.

According to these legends, Buddha grew up to manhood without having any idea of death, disease, or the decay caused by old age. When in his twenty-ninth year he first saw a dead body, an old man and a diseased person, he was so impressed with the miseries of human life, as to determine at once to leave his home in the search after a remedy. The stories are very dramatic no doubt, but they cannot be taken to have any element of probability, consistently with what is known to all men as to the usual course of human affairs. Even supposing that Buddha's domestic life was a happy one, and that the only motive which led him to adopt the garb of a mendicant was his philanthropic zeal for the good of mankind, it does not seem reasonable that his determination was the result of a sudden impulse. Cases of renunciation like his are not of rare occurrence among Indian princes. In our own days, Lala Babn and Rajas Protap Chand and Ram Kant have perhaps made far greater sacrifices than the son of Sudhodana. In every case of Sanyas in high life in recent times, the determination is more or less known to have been caused by domestic unhappiness, or by the undue influence of some religious teacher on the enthusiastic neophyte. It seems likely, that Buddha was influenced in the same way. At any rate, the steadiness which he evinced in the course of life that he adopted goes very far to show that his determination was not the result of a sudden impulse, but of long and careful deliberation. If he had been led by only an accidental flash of enthusiasm, his zeal would have cooled down as quickly, and he would have come back to his father within a few days. He had evidently gone through a long course of mental preparation, and the reali-ties of a mendicant's life frightened him not.

the metropolis of the Magadha Empire. This act does not seem to be consistent with the view that it was only the miseries of the world that had led him to leave his paternal roof. Surely, he could have no reason whatever to suppose that Raj Griha was the place where the necessary remedy was obtainable. It is more probable that, like other men of ability and ambition, he was attracted to the metropolis of the Empire in the search after adventure. According to his biographers, soothsayers had predicted that he was to be either a mighty emperor or a Buddha. That may be taken to show what the goal of his ambition originally had been. Evidently, he saw no way to be an emperor, and adopted the safer but more ambitious career, by which he managed to have himself worshipped as a god by all classes, by princes as well as by peasants.

vastu had attracted the notice of King Bimbasara at the very first entrance into Raj Griha. That is not quite impossible. It seems more probable, however, that he became known to the King either through his preceptor Ram Putra Rudraka or through Amba Pali of Vaisali who was Bimbasara's mistress, and who subsequently became one of the leading Buddhistic nuns. Ram Putra Rudraka was one of the favoured Pandits of the Court of Bimbasara,

It is said that the princely mendicant of Kapil-and who subsequently became one of the leading Buddhistic nuns. Ram Putra Rudraka was one of the favoured Pandits of the Court of Bimbasara, and as such Pandits, when they visit the Kings who patronise them, are generally accompanied by their leading pupils, it was not unlikely that Buddha's first introduction to Bimbasara was as a pupil of the then great philosophical teacher of Raj Griha. Whatever the origin of the acquaintance may have been, the great prophet knew that to establish a high position in the country, or in the estimation of the King, by Sanskrit scholarship alone, was a very difficult task, and quite impossible during the lifetime of his preceptor. So, after passing some years at Raj Griha as a pupil and acquiring some reputation as a scholar of great promise, he retired to an adjoining forest on the banks of the river Niranjan, and for a time gave himself up to the practice of most severe austerities.

The discipline to which he was believed to be subjecting himself, raised him considerably in the veneration of the King and his people. Asceticism, though useful at starting of a religious career, cannot always be welcome to one with secular ambition. At any rate, after six years of self mortification, the "lion" of the Sakya race discovered that penances and fasts were not the road to heaven. His reputation for superior sanctity had been then completely established, and so he emerged from his seclusion giving out that he had discovered the true remedy for the miseries of the world. The panacea found was neit' er original, nor of any use for practical purposes. His doctrines were exactly the same as those of many orthodox Hindus, namely, that our miseries are caused by desires, and that, to get rid of the former we must learn to overcome the latter. Sir Monier Williams gives Buddha the credit of having had the power of presenting old ideas in new and more attractive garb. But the great anti-Brahmanical prophet adopted the ideas of Brahmanical philosophy without any modification. Cessation of desires was the panacea prescribed by both, as if it were possible for any human being to feel happy without food, drink, &c. A spiritual teacher may be believed to have the power of saving the soul from perdition after death. But so far as the miseries of this world are concerned, it is impossible to give either Buddha or any other prophet the credit of having given a satisfactory remedy.

However that may be, Buddha was so convinced of the value of his discovery, that he at first felt inclined to keep it to himself, without giving the benefit of it to the world. Even the gods were distressed at his determination. He was led to be more philanthropic only for the remonstrances of Brahma, the creating god of the Hindu Triad. Such tactics to heighten one's importance would, in secular spheres, hardly prove of any use even with the weakest of Indian princes. But the faith of men in saints and prophets is unbounded.

Buddha commenced preaching of the new faith at Benares. His first disciples were the five men who had been deputed by his father to attend him while studying at Raj Griha. They had waited on him also when practising austerities on the banks of the Niranjana. When he gave up asceticism, and became mindful of personal comforts, they left him and went to Benares, It is said that the cause of their leaving him was his abandonment of asceticism. The fact that they did not return to their native country but proceeded to Benares, points to the conclusion that they had been sent thither by Buddha to prepare the ground for him.

The sixth convert was a young man of Benares named Yasa. His father came next. While the neophyte was passing the night at the hermitage, his father searched for him in every part of the town. The son had left his slippers on the bank of the river Varuna, and the father was led to apprehend that he had been killed by some wild beast. When thus in a state of terrible auxiety, Buddha offered him the information he wanted on condition of his accepting the new faith, and he readily consented. Yasa himself became a Bhikshu while his father, mother and wife remained lay disciples. Fifty-four other men of Benares followed the example of Yasa, so that there were sixty Bhikshus in all at the end of the first year. Buddha deputed these, two by two, to preach the new faith in other parts of the country. He himself repaired to the vicinity of Gaya where he succeeded in converting the great Pandits of the place together with their pupils. The prophet had now a large number of followers, and was a person of such importance as to be invited by King Bimbasara to revisit Raj Griha. A large and commodious garden house called Venuvana or the Bamboo grove was given him for his residence. The King also supplied everything that Buddha and his followers required for creature comforts. Thus enabled to keep his followers well-housed and well-fed, Buddha was able to add to the number of his disciples every day. They spent nine months in preaching, and passed the three months of the rainy season in one of the monasteries that the king and the people had built for their accommodation.

Buddha passed the second year of his ministry in Raj Griha. It was then that Sudatta, a rich merchant of Sravasti, became his disciple, and invited him to the chief city of Kosala. Buddha suggested to him the building of a Vihara for his reception. Sudatta built the monastery of Jetavana, When Buddha arrived he was received with great honours, and a formal gift of the Jetavana was made to him He passed the was or rainy season of the third year of his ministry in Sravasti. During his residence there king Prasunajit of Kosala was converted.

Shortly after his conversion, the king of Kosala sent a message to Suddhadana congratulating him for having such a great son as Buddha. Thereupon, the king of Kapilavastu sent several messengers to Buddha asking him to visit his parents and relatives. After avoiding compliance for a long time, Buddha at last consented on condition that he built a monastery for the holy order at Kapilavastu. Suddhadana agreed and built the vihara known as Nyagrodhavana or Banyan grove. When Buddha arrived at Kapilavastu his father and other relatives gave him a warm reception. They all embraced the faith, and a great many of them entered the monastic order. Some of these Sakya monks gave great trouble to Buddha afterwards.

One of the greatest innovations introduced by Buddha was the admission of women to the monastic order. According to the Hindu Shastras, the duties of a woman are—to be obedient to her husband in his lifetime, and to lead a chaste life after his death. From the Buddhistic histories it appears, that no teacher before Buddha had allowed women the privilege. Buddha himself had, it is said, some misgivings on the subject. It is represented that he regarded women with great distrust, and that he permitted them to become nuns for the sake of his favourite disciple Anauda who had pleaded their cause, and for meeting the wishes of his old maternal aunt and step mother, Mahaprajapati Gautami, At the Council held at Raj Griha after Buddha's death, his first locum tenens, Maha Kasyapa, severely censured Ananda for having women admitted to the holy order. When Mahaprajapati Gautami and her companions became nuns, Ananda's age could not have been more than five years. It is therefore difficult to see how he could be responsible for the part he is said to have played. The entreaties of Gautami Mahaprajapati, if the story be based upon truth, were certainly irresistible to Buddha. May it not be that he was led to admit women more for adding to the attractions of monastic life, than for obliging either Ananda or an aged aunt? Some of the rules laid down for the guidance of the Bhikshus lead to the same conclusion.

Buddha, like many other mendicants, was a great favourite with the softer sex. While yet engaged in meditations at Gaya, he went one day to a neighbouring village named Senika. The headman of the village had two unmarried daughters named Nanda and Nanda Bala. These ladies prepared rice pudding for Boldha and, after putting the same into his alms bowl, asked him to marry them. Their guest rejected their prayer. He visited them again when on his way from Benares to Raj Griha. On this occasion they were accepted as lay disciples. Another of his devoted female disciples was the lady of Vaisali called in the Buddhist annals "Visakha, the mother of Mrigadhara,"

The precise time when Amba Pali, the mistress of of Bimbasara, decided to follow Buddha, is not known. Most likely the acquaintance had begun when Buddha was a student at Raj Griha. At any rate, when he commenced to preach the new faith, Amba was enamoured of it; and he not only accepted the gift of a garden house made by her, but actually partook of her hospitality with all the monks accompanying him. The example thus set by the teacher was largely followed by the disciples.

After the conversion of the Sakya ladies, Buddha went to the town of Vaisali now identified with a village called Bisarah in the vicinity of Bakhra in the Muzafferpur district. Vaisali was a sort of free city governed by its leading residents called the Lichavis. At Vaisali Buddha vanquished in argument Purna Kacyap and many other philosophical teachers. After these feats, Buddha went to the Tryastrinsa heaven, and there preached his religion to his mother and a host of gods. During his absence, his disciples were oppressed with grief. After about three months, he came down to earth again by a vaidurya (lapis lazuli) staircase, the foot of which was fixed near an Udumbar tree in the town of Sankisya, near Kanouj.

A few years before Buddha's death, there was a great schism in his camp, headed by his cousin Deva Datta. He had been made to enter the holy order by a stratagem, and was never a very sincere follower of Buddha. As Buddha had the confidence of the old King Bimbasara, Deva Datta somehow managed to make himself a favourite with Ajatasatru, the heir-apparent. Ajatasatru brought about the death of his affectionate father in a very cruel manner. Deva Datta's attempts to put an end to the life of his great cousin were frustrated by miracles. After the death of Bimbasara, the inevitable reaction came in the mind of Ajatasatru. He was sorely oppressed with remorse, and through the influence of his step brother and physician, Jivaka Kumara Bhaud, he took steps to be re-conciled to Buddha. In Kosala also there was a revolution similar to that in Magadha. King Prasnajit's son, Virudhaka, was led by Ambarisha, a son of the royal chaplain, to dethrone his father, and to compel him to leave the kingdom. The Prime Minister of the State at first refused to help Virudhaka. But the ultimate success of the heir-apparent in attaining the object of his guilty ambition was mainly due to the co-operation of the Premier. After his dethronement, Prasnajit repaired to Raj Griha. But he died of hunger and thirst before Ajatasatru could do anything for his relief. The success of the revolution in Kosala was in all probability due to the support that Virudhaka received from the orthodox faction, and not to any schism among the followers of Buddha. At any rate, Virudhak, after ascending the throne of Kosala, never showed any sympathy for the new faith. On the contrary, he immediately declared war against the Sakyas of Kapilvastu, and very soon effected the complete destruction of the clan to which Buddha belonged.

After the conquest of Kapilavastu by Virudhaka, Buddha lived for sometime at Raj Griha. He had now wellnigh completed the usual span of human life. Feeling that his death must take place soon, he left Raj Griha for the Vrij country, where he intended to die. On his way he sojourned at Patali Putra for a a few days, and was there respectfully entertained by Varshakar, the Premier of Ajatasatru, who was then superintending the building of the future metropolis of Magadha.

Leaving Patali Putra, Buddha arrived at Vaisali and lived there for a few days in the gorden presented to him by Amba Pali. On this occasion, the prophet partook of the hospitality of the old courtezan. From Vaisali, Buddha went to a neighbouring town called Beliva, for the rains. A famine now broke out in the country, and as it therefore became impossible for his monks to get alms readily, he advised them to tide over the season of scarcity by living with their friends. That they were left to shift for themselves was perhaps due Lala Babu left home as a mendicant. But when chiefly to the withdrawal of State since the accession of Virudhaka and Ajatasatru to the thrones of Kosala and Magadha respectively. Virudhaka hated the Buddhists bitterly, and Ajatasatru, though reconciled to Buddha latterly, was not always kindly disposed towards his followers.

The event in the life of a prophet which causes the greatest strain on the tactics of a believing biographer, is his death. For an exact idea of the manuer in which the Buddhistic annalists acquitted themselves in this difficult task, the reader must refer to the original works. The biographers of Buddha sometimes state the facts without any kind of colouring. But it is not always so. For instance, in many places the favourite disciple Ananda is charged with the responsibility of his master's death, because of his not having asked him to prolong his life. When at Beluva, a dire illness befell Buddha, but he thought that it would not be right to pass away while the congregation of bhikshus was scattered. So he retained hold of his body until it had accomplished its task.

Divested of legendary colouring, the plain fact was that Buddha recovered from his illness at Beluva. After the rains, he went bak to Vaisali. Wishing to die at Kushinara, he left Vaisali. On his way he halted at various places. At Jalanuka, he was invited by one Kundu, a worker in metal, to partake of his hospitality. The host put some pork in Buddha's alms bowl, and that was the cause of the malady that brought about his death. His demise caused the earth to shake and thunderbolts to fall. His funeral was performed by the mallas of Kushinara, in accordance with the directions left by him and as stated in the following conversation:-

" Ananda. How then, Lord, must the Brahmans and householders who are believers, honour the Blessed One's remains? Buddha. Ananda, they must treat them as those of a king of kings?

Budiba. Ananda, the body of a king of kings is wrapped in bands of cotton, and when it has thus been wrapped it is covered with five hundred layers. After that it is put in an iron case filled with oil, and it is covered with a double cover of iron; then a funeral pile of all kinds of odoriferous woods is built, the ramains are burnt and the fire is put out with milk. Then they put his bones in a golden casket and in the cross road they build a chaiter over his remains and with haldsehins flags and streament. a chaitya over his remains, and with baldachins, flags and streamers, perfumes, garlands, incense and sweet powders, with sounds of music, they honour, praise, venerate and revere him, and celebrate a feast in his honour. So, likewise, Ananda, must they treat the Tatthagata's remains."

the Tatthagata's remains."

These directions may be taken to show what kind of ambition lurked in the heart of the great mendicant. As instances of suicide in high life are not quite unknown, there are also many cases of men in affluent circumstances renouncing home, either from domestic unhappiness, or for love of adventure, or craving for variety, or for shaking off the trainfiels of royalty. Sanyas from such causes deserves no more admiration or honour than a felo de se. The prince who can be honour ed and adored as an ascetic, is he who sacri-fices his personal comfort for the happiness of his subjects, and not he who abdicates his throne to sink into obscurity. A love of workely comfort and wordly honour is interent in our moral nature. Although a man may, a pareding his piety or for any other enuse, make a voluntary sacrifice of his we find him in retirement acquiring properties in and near Vrindaban, he cannot possibly claim credit for indifference to wordly greatness. The case was probably the same with Buddha. He gave up, it is true, the certain prospect of succeeding to the throne of his father. But every act done and every word uttered by him show that he was actuated by a deep-rooted ambition for a far higher position

HE INVESTED ONLY 7/6.

THERE is a man who has spent the part twenty-five years of his life exploring for gold and other minerals in Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, Ta-mania, and New Zealand. He has no doubt picked up some money, yet he says that the investment of 7/6 brought him in bigger returns than any other he ever made.

Yet, hold on a minute. Don't let us jump to the conclusion that we can all get rich out of the proceeds of 7/6 till we hear further from this financier. He has a humorous way of putting a serious thing, for which we should like linu all the more. Some folk have no idea this sound sense and genuine four are twin brothers, but they are all Still, he reminds us that in the end we must pay for what we get.

"The calling of a prospectin, for instance," said Mr. Peck, "is full of hard work. Besides, it entails rough living, such as sail junk, soddened damper, with tea in bucketfus. One must have the digestive capacity of an ostrich of an anaconda to stand that diet for long. It must therefore be taken as proof of the good in chunery limide of my system, when I mention that I activally stood it for nearly twenty-five years.

Mi. Peck's conjecture is exactly parallel with the fact as set forth in the official statistics of all civillised countries. No other disease so demaralises and depresses human mature. It attacks the secret strongholds of the reason and drives pople insame; it suppries the sensibilities; it turns men and women into selfish, useless, muisances; it impess them to commit one. All this in addition to their own desolation and suffring. Yes, in Peck is quite right.

But to get back to what he says bout lumself. At the advice of a friend—Mi. W. Williams of this place I began to take the far-famed Mother Seigel's Cirative Syrop. What result did it have? I'll tell you: It has transformed me from a prematurely old man into one quite generatel.

"I am a rapid eater and can't break myself of the bad habit. Hence I make it apoint to keep a bottle by me always and an occasional does when necessary to see me right.

"I am a rapid eater and can't break myself of the bid habit. Hence I make it spoint to keep a bottle by me always and an occasional dose when necessary to set me right.

"I can safely assent that the investment of 7/6 in Mother Seigel", Curative Syrup was the best I ever made in all my chequered vareer. You may depend that I prescribe this medicine to all and sundry people I come in contract with. Prior to using it I spent pounds at different times, but only got partial relief. Syrup a sins to make straight for the scat of the trouble. I pen these lines just to show other sufferers the way out. There are any number of respectable persons here who can attest the truth of what I have written.—Respectfully (Signed) Wm. Bromfield Peck, Russell, Bay of Islands, New Zealand, July 2nd, 1892."

We don't call for witnesses. Mr. Peck's tale is farnkness and truth tiself. We hold out our hand in greeting across the sea. Dyspepsia is a living death, and Mother Seigel gives new life. Millions sing that chorns. But he had better eat slower. Wite again and tell us you are doing so. Friend Peck.

THE DREAM OF ARGYLE.

The unfortunate Duke of Argyle, who shared the disastrous defeat of Monmouth, under James II, was found sleeping by the officers who time to lead him to the scaffold.

EARTHLY arms no more uphold him; On his prison's stony floor, Waiting death in calmest slumber, Rests the great Mac-Cullinn More!

And he dreams a dream of boyhood,
 Of his dear-loved Argyleshte,
 Of his bold, heroic clansmen,
 Of his plumed and plaided sire.

Once again, with pulses beating, Hears the wandering minstrel tell How Montrose, on Inversry, Thief-like from his mountains fell.

Now he stands, in plaid and bonnet, if In the grim and sombre hall, And again the ruddy firelight Sees he on the armour fall.

Down the glen, beyond the castle,
Where the Linn's white waters shine,
He, the heir of haughty Argyle,
Meets young Effic of Loch Fine--

Effie, with her snooded tresses, And her timid eye of blue, At the gloaming, to her trysting, In the bracken valley true!

Now he hears a sad lamenting—
Harpers for his mother mourn,
As, with floating plume and pinion,
To the burial cairn she's borne.

Then, anou, his dreams are darker— Sounds of battle fill his ears, And the pibroch's mournful wailing For his father's fall he hears.

Wild Lochaber's mountain echdes
Wail in concert for the dead,
And Loch Awe's hoarse waters murmur
For the Campbell's glory fled.

Fierce and bold, the godless tyrants Trample the apostate land, While her poor and faithful remnants Wait for the Avenger's hand. Once again at Inverary, Years of weary exile o'er, Armed to lead his scattered clausmen, Stands the bold Mac-Cullium More!

Once again to battle calling,
Sound the war-pipes through the glen,
And the court-yard of Dunstaffinage
'Rings with tread of armed men.'

All is lost! the godless triumph!
And the faithful ones and true,
From the scaffold and the prison,
Covenant with God anew.

On the darkness of his dreaming, Great and sudden glory shone; 'Over bonds and death victorious, Stands he by his Father's throne.

From the radiant host of martyrs,
Notes of joy and praise he hears,
Songs of his poor land's deliverance,
Sounding from the future years.

Lo! he wakes! but airs celestial
 Bathe hum in immortal rest;

 And he sees, 'with insealed vision,'
 Scotland's cause with victory blest.

Shining hosts attend and guard hun,
As he leaves his prison door;
And to death, as to a triumph,
Walks the great Mac-Cullum More!

WEEKLYANA.

PARIS will celebrate the centenary of the discovery of lithography by an exhibition of the art. The show will be held under Government patronage and open on the 15th August.

PAPER has been put to many uses—noble and ignoble. In this cheap age, it plays many parts, and is constantly receiving attention from the ingenious. The latest achievements are paper gloves and stockings. The latter bave been known for sometime. They are now much improved, being not thin, rotten things, but quite tough. You can have them for three-pence a pair.

THE Ordnance Surv., Map of England is near completion. For the last twenty years, they have been spending on it £200,000 a year. The lasest maps show every bedge, ditch, building and even every isolated tree.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

BEWARE of licking your envelope! An American died at Cleveland, Ohio, of blood poisoning, caused by a slight cut on his tongue while licking the flap of an envelope. This is a warning also against many unclean acts of ordinary daily life.

At the annual meeting of the Newspaper Society held at the Salisbury Hotel, on the 8th May, there was a long discussion on the loss to the English Post Office from the reduced Piess rates of telegraphy. The following resolution was ultimately arrived at nem con.

"That there is no good ground for allocating the alleged loss on the telegraph service to Press inessages, and that any attempt to raise the charges for these messages would involve an act of injustice and a breach of faith between the Government and the Press which should be resisted in every way by the newspaper Press of the United Kingdom."

A HUNGARIAN compositor, named Kumez, out of employ, applied to the head of the Atheneum Printing Works at Buda Pesth for assistance. While receiving it, he fired two shots at him from a revolver, wounded him mortally, and then blew out his own brains. No explanation is given of the mystery

PROFESSOR de Goeje is engaged on a new edition of Wright's Arabic Gramman. The larn left unfinished by the late Prof. William Wright will be completed by Prof. Sachan of Berlin,

In the Supreme Court of England, Jonas, a solicitor, sued Abrahams and others, proprietors and publishers of the Morning Advertiser, for damages for libel. The solicitor being bankingt, a report of the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court appeared in the Advertiser. Closely following the report in that case, but without any distinguishing head line, there were published the proceedings in bankruptcy of a beeishop keeper. The two reports thus seemed one. The propinquity of the publican was too much for the solicitor. He raged and threatened. The Advertiser made a correction and offered further explanation if required. The man of law was still inconsolable. He missted that the confusion had mjured him in his profession, and brought his action. The jury after the address of the defendants' counsel, stopped the case and returned a verdict for the defendants-Another paper which had copied the Advirtiser was also proceeded against. The verdict in that case was also the same. We hope Jonas is now satisfied that he has established to the world that he is neither a publican nor a sinner.

If such derangement of epitaphs were actionable, many of the Indian journals would suffer every week and day.

THE Ceylon Patriot while correcting an error falls into another .-

"Under the heading 'A distinguished Jaffua Tamit' in the portion allotted to the news of the week in our last issue, Mr. C. W. Thamodaiampillai, B. A., B. L., is said to have been raised to the raise of Ran Bahadur on the last Queen's Birthday. The title conferred on him by the Government of India is not Ran Bahadur, but Rao Bahadur, a higher distinction.

We know of no distinction, except the verbal, between the two titles. The Rai Baliadoor of Bengal is the Rao Baliadooi of Bombay and Madras The developing Burke of India, in his Peerage, brackets the two distinctions. We shall indeed be obliged for further light, Capital corrects a misapprehension entertained by a contemporary regarding a recent soit, in which the Administrator-General was conceined" "The suit," it says, " was decided when Mr. Collis-Sandes was acting as Administrator-General, and it was entirely due to him that the appeal to the Privy Conneil was preferred, and the judgment of the Chief Justice maintained against those of his colleagues," In native society, the credit is given to the attorney, who was so sure of the incorrectness of the judgment of the High Court that he had offered to pay the expenses of the appeal to England and thereby, in a manner, forced the Administrator General to take the step.

THE Ceylon Retrenchment Commission reports on Exchange Compensation Allowance in these words : -

"The Commission further recommends that all persons who join the Public Service in Ceylon after due consideration of this report, say from and after ist July, 1895, should not be paid any allowance for the dependance of the super if superior officers, or the 10 per cent, increase if in the Cleucal and Subordinate branches of the Public Service.

The Commission, while fully acknowledging the hardship inflicted on the older officers by the fall in the value of silver measured in gold, which has taken place since they first joined the Public Service, sees no sufficient reason to contemplate any serious further fall in the future.

The Commission admits that at the present value of silver future officers in the Public Service will receive less remimeration than their predecessors in office, but the Commission observes that part passu with the decrease in value of silver the number of duly qualified candidates for employment has augmented, and that for the ordinary demands of the Public Service (excluding specialists) the qualifications of candidates who joined not long before the recent grant of compensation were rather above than below the average higher obstanced.

The same observation applies to the Clerical and Subordinate Service. The Commission is convinced that if this recommendation be carried out there will be no difficulty in recruiting suitable officers for the Public Service.

As regards specialists, no rule need be laid down beforehand, because the Government has always to pay whatever may be the current market price for the services of a specialist whenever one is engaged. The anomaly of paying different rates to senion and juntor officers for similar work has been suffered in previous instances, and has caused far less practical difficulty than the payment of the compensation recently granted entails now.

WR read in the Effective Advertiser : -

"A tricycle has been brought out in Paris as a novel advertising agent. It prints any set word or design in bold characters on the street flags of pavement. A skilfal rider mounts the machine and in an incredibly short space of time 'advertises' the city from one end to the other. The back wheels of the tricycle have wide rims, which are shod with a rubber type that carries in Telefithe advertisement to be shod with a jubber type that carries in leftef the advertisement to be made known. Above the wheels are placed two ink rollers, which are fed automatically with ink through tubes running to a reservoir on the top of the mathine. The movement of the pedals actuates a smill blower which sends are into a tube placed in front of each of the motive wheels. By this contrivance any dirt or dust which might impain the legibility of the imprint is blown to one side, and a clean surface is secured. A special arrangement enables the design on either wheel to be printed in different colours.

We are afraid the walls of houses are no longer available. The streets must supply the omission. But how long da the impressions made by the running wheels last or are visible?

Another advertising novelty is to be seen in Geneva. The Pall Mall Gazette writes :-

"A new and objectionable form of advertising has appeared at Geneva. It is called 'Paffichage sublacustre,' and consists of advertisements which can be read several feet under water, the subject being painted in yellow letters on a black ground, and so placed that the words me magnified. It is at the Pont du Mont Blanc, in the crystal-clear waters of the Rhone, that this deformity is first to appear. Land and water will soon be equally disfigured everywhere. In the country the sky remaints, but the New Titan, who is the biliposter, will manage somehow to scale the beavens."

Even the church-yard is not free :--

"In San Francisco, an enterprising citizen has already chosen his build plot, and set up a handsome marble monument containing just the initials of his decensed wife and the announcement that the rest of the space is to let for advertisements."

In India, we have no such enterprise. Even advertising in proper place is little appreciated. But there is developing a trade in which one advertises himself under a false European name, usually a firm as a guarantee of respectability and security of homograble deal ing, offering to supply goods at a cheap rate and sending you none when the value is received. The advertiser is not the resident of the place whence the goods are offered. He may be living at Calcutta while his offices are supposed to be at Delhi, Allahabad, Lucknow or Benares. The Calcinta police has detected about fifty such bogus firms. But it does not appear that any steps have been taken to suppress or punish the fraud.

THE Bengal High Court has its Mahomedan Judge. The N.-W. Provinces' had its. Bombay has now been allowed one. Syed Ameer Ali is reputed to be an author. Syed Mahmood began brilliantly and ended before his time as inglonously. He has sunk from that high emineuce into writing madayi-tarikh. The first had always set his heart upon the appointment and worked for it. The second had won the place by his talemb. Mr. Budiuddin Tyebji has been sought out. This is the second time that the post was offered him. He succeeds the barrister Judge Mr. Justice Bayley just retired. Mr. Tyebji richly deserves the elevation.

THE Mostem Chronicle and the Muhammadan Observer of last week cuncludes a leader on the late Moulvi Cheragh Ah, of Hyderabad, with the words. —

"The Hon'ble Mr. Syed Mahmud, a personal friend of Moulvi Cherag Ah has given expression to his sud feeling, on the lamented death of his friend, in the following misra, the numerical value in oriental notation of which gives the date of his demise (1895)."

After a rule (in the printer's language) to mark the close of the article, there runs a line in Persian—" Harf cheraghi-ah az dunia nihan shūd," meaning, Alas I Ali's Lamp has disappeared from the world.

We will not say anything as to the literary conduct of the paper which allows the rule to precede the closing line, or the taste that dubbs a man Honourable when he has ceased to be so. We will only enquire—has the Persian line been properly characterized? Syed Mahimood has, indeed, caused disappointment to many. But has he so far forgotten houself as not to know what mirra is? Or, is it the prig of the press of Imdad Ali's Line who quotes him at second-hand through the Tahzibul Akhlaq of Alligath, that must answer for the blunder? He poses as a scholar and belongs to a family of cultivating authors. His immediate progenitor has been made famous by an irregular combination of words attributed to unin,—a combination that has been of mich use to Augho-Indian writers while charging the people of India with want of independence and the desire to follow the beck of officials. The present descendant seems destined for minortulity as well by exinguishing distinction between poetry and prose.

In the House of Commons, on June 11, Sir William Wedderburn enquired of the Secretary of State for India what extensions had been made of her Majestey's Indian possessions subsequent to the passing of the Act for the better government of India (1858); in what years were such extensions made; and what was the name and area of such extension. In reply, Mr. (since Sir Henry) Fowler named Uppuer Burma with its area of about 83,500 square inless added in 1886. The next year the frontier districts of Pishin and Sihi with their dependencies, which had been under Buttish administration under the Treaty of Gugadanuk since 1879, were incorporated with British India, Beside these, a considerable intuition of considerable intuition of territory including numerous exhanges with native Princes, had taken place in various ways since 1858, the area in most cases being comparatively small.

Replying to Mr. Keay, he could only say that in their dealings with Native States, as in other matters, the Government of India use their discretion whether or not the approval of the Secretary of State in Council before taking action. Further, that it was not for the public interest that the papers relating to the Bhurtpur succession should be laid on the table.

Lord Elgin is exceptionally forunate. His immediate predecessors were not even privileged to publish reports of Commissions held in India without orders from Hume. With greater and improved facilities of communication between India and England and greater interest taken in England in Indian affairs, the Viceroy of India has been reduced to an Agent for carrying out orders. He must even take orders for words to between on particular occasions to recommend a policy to his legislative Council or in dispragement of it. We hinted at the time at the difficulty the present Viceroy had with the Home Government regarding the import duties on cotton.

The Secretary of State would not lay on the table the papers relating to Bhurtpore, because, as he said, they were of no public interest. The Fowler definition of the phrase must be very marrow indeed. In the same way, other Native Princes may be pursued out of their dominious, without the public of India or of England knowing anything about the cause, Maharaja Ram Sing may not be deserving of sympathy. He was discarded by his father. Maharaja Jaswant Sing, shortly before his death, had gone the length of addressing letters to the British Government to exclude him from succession. Yet Ram Sing was installed Maharaja within a fortnight of the late Chief's death, Those who were instrumental in bringing him to power have, like himself, either been sent away or deprived of power-for good or evil. The brave Martelli had recommended Ram Sing for the guddi. When on it, the Colonel discovered cause to report him. Colonel Trevol, the then Agent to the Governor General, came to Bhurtpur to enquire. Within a mouth, there was an entire change. The political quartered on Bhartpur was transferred, Colonel Fraser who had replaced Colonel Martelli, has now gone on leave of six months, making over charge to Colonel Loch. Pandit Bishen Lal, the hero of the arama that is being enacted at Bhurtpur, has been divested of all source of infinence. His relations and men have all ceased to 'hold any office. In March, the Maharaja removed himself to Muttra where he still is. He had wanted to go back to Bhurtpur. He was told that Mussooree would suit him better. The Maharaja shews no predilection for that place. There is boulversement in Bhuttpore, A new Dewan has been appointed from the Berar Commission.

The Pioneer had deported Maharaja Ram Sing to Meerut. The Calcutta papers have brought him down to Uttarpara. One of them is

"Rao Krishna Deo Saran Singh, the lately deposed Maharajah of Bharipore, with his only son, aged about ten years, is at piesent sying at the Uttarpanah Public Libray as guests of Baba Rash Behari Mukeiji. The Maharajah is a very quiet, unostentatious and kindhearted gentleman. He is also an orthidox Hindu, and devotes the gleater portion of his time to religious matters."

The Unarpara Library is classic ground, for Dr. Hunter had lived there and Michael Datta, the Bengali poet. It has yet to be the fit residence of a Prince. Although not permitted to visit his dominions, Maharaja Ram Sing has not ceased to be the ruler of Bhuripur. Nor is it to be supposed that the British Government which has the supervision of the State will tolerate the hospitality of an occuracy Bengal Zemindar for a ruling chief. The fact is, the guest at the Library is not Bhurtpur himself, but a descendant of the exiled branch of the royal family. He is the grandson of Durjan Sal who had usurped the State during the rute of his younger cousin Maharaja Bulwant Sing, grandfather of the present Maharaja. Danjan, after the war which he had occasioned, was deported to Adamond. He was afterwards allowed to live at Benares, where his family draw from the Bhurtpur Durbar, through the Commissioner of Benares as ex-officio Agent to the Governor-General, a monthly subsistance allowance of Rs. 300.

THE LAW AND THE BUNNIAH.

In June last the Government of India sent a circular letter to the Locali Governments asking for their opinions on the subject of the usury laws. The Government of the N.-W. Provinces accordingly invited opinions from the Allahabad High Court and from Subordinate Judicial Officers. Among the mass of correspondence which this request clicited is an important Minute by the Chief MINUTE BY SIR JOHN EDGE.

I have read the letter No. 685 VII-654B of 1894, dated Naint Tal, the 9th July 1894, from the Secretary to Government, North-Western Provinces and Oudh, to the Registrar and the papers therein referred to.

therein referred to.

2. I am decidedly of opinion that some alteration of the law in the directions suggested is necessary.

3. In order to avoid misconception I think it right to point out with reference to paragraph 36 of the Resolution by the Government of India, Home Department, No. 17 Judkial, 1497-1502, dated the 20th November 1891, that the statement "the High Courts have held that Act XXVIII of 1855, which repealed the usury laws, did not affect the Hindu laws as to the rate of interest" is onen to question. If by that statement is inconded to be under usury laws, and not all the transfer and the late of the late of the side of the late of t therein referred to; which I understand to be that interest exceeding therein referred to; which I understand to be that interest exceeding in amount the principal may not be demanded at any one time. I believe that that rule of Hindu law is applied by the High Court at Bombay in cases in which the parties to the countract are Hindus, whilst the High Court at Madras has held that the rule of Hindu law is not binding. I also believe that the Supreme Court at Calcutta for some time applied this rule MAHENDRA LAI. SIRCIR, M.D., Honorary Secretary. of Hindu law, but that the High Court of Cilcutta has not applied that rule on the appellate side. In eight we is experience in this High Court I cannot call to my recollection at y case in which that rule of Hindu law has been held to apply in these Provinces, although several of the Judges during that period in this High Court, myself amongst the number, have wished that we could apply that rule. I believe that this High Court has never applied that rule of Hindu law.

applied that rule of Hindu law.

4. With reference to the same paragraph 36 of the Resolution of the Government of India, Home Department, I think it right also to state that this High Court considers that when a rate of interest is stated in a bond signed by a defendant, a Judge 1s, by reason of section 2 of Act N. XXVIII of 1855, bound to decree interest in accordance with the contract unless the contract is proved to have been an unconscionable one, or to be tamted with fraud, or to have been made by the defendant in ignorance of the true nature of the transaction, or in cases to which that doctrine applies, to have been obtained by undue influence. That also is, I believe, the view of the law on that subject which now obtains in the High Court, Madras.

5. Cases have frequently come before me in which I strongly desired to give relief against high contractual interest, feeling that the contrctual rate of interest was exorbitant and crushing, but in which I was unable to do otherwise than make a decree according to the contract owing to the fact that nothing had been proved which would entitle a Court to interfere with the contract made by the parties to it. In many such cases nothing had even been pleaded which if proved would entitle a Court to grant relief against the

As I understand the law, a Judge is not, from the mere fact that the rate of interest contracted to be poid seems to him excessively high and crushing, to infer, without any proof of the circumstances under which the contract was made, that the rate of interest stipulated for in the contract was exorbitant in the sense of unreasonable, or that it would be equitable to grant relief.

Interest at the rate of 20 per cent, might be unreasonably high in a case in which the borrower gave good security for the loan, or his personal credit was good: whilst in another case in which the borrower had no security to give or could only give security which a prudent man would consider to be doubtful, hazardous or practically worthless, 40, 50, 60 or even 70 per cent. might not be an unreasonable rate of interest which a perfectly honest lender might stipulate for, having regard to the risk he was running of losing aot only interest but principal.

Again a borrower might be under an urgent necessity, with which the lender was in no way concerned, for obtaining an immediate loan, and it might be in fact inconvenient for the lender to advance the money at the time, and consequently it might be reasonable for the lender to refuge to lend his money at an ordinary rate of interest.

What I desire to point out is that neither a Judge nor any one else could say that the agreed rate of interest was unconscionable, unless he had before him the circumstances under which the loan was applied for and made.

In my opinion it frequently happens that a borrower does not understand the true nature of the contract which he makes as to interest or thinks only of to-day and is heedless of the future.

- 6. As I understand the law it is for the person who seeks to he relieved from the performance of his contract to make out a case for relief. I see however no good reason why the Legislature pears to a Judge to be high, or in which the rate of interest appears to a Judge to be high, or in which it is pleaded that the full consideration for the contract was not given, that the borrower did not understand the contract or was misled as to its nature or effect, the contract was reasonable, that the consideration passed and that the transaction was legitimate, should be on the lender.
- I suggest that the Legislature should enact that when on a 7. I suggest that the Legislature should chart that when on a loan it is agreed that compound interest or any interest exceeding 12 per centum per annum shall be paid or allowed in account it shall be incumbent on the lender to prove that the contract was fair and reasonable, and that when the interest does not exceed 12 per centum per annum the Judge may, if he thinks fit, throw upon the lender the onus of proving that the contract was fair and reasonable, and that in all cases, whether the suit be for a simple money decree for the recovery of a debt or a suit under Chapter IV of Act No. IV of 1832, the Judge of first instance and every Court, including a Court of second appeal before which the suit comes in appeal, may require the lender to prove otherwise than by a written contract the amount of the consideration actually given, and that the contract was, under the circumstances or the case as they were known at the date of the loan, fair and reasonable, and that no Judge in any such case shall be bound to decree a greater sum for principal or for interest than is shown to be reasonable.

All the Judges of the Court, except Mr. Justice Aikman, concur entirely in the Chief Justice's Minute, and adopted it as an expression of their own victys. Mr. Aikman, while agreeing generally with the Chief Justice, recorded a Minute of his own.

-----MR. JUSTICE AIKMAN'S MINUTE.

I am strongly of opinion that some legislation is required to obviate the admitted evils which arise from the present state of things. Owing to the improvidence and ignorance of the bulk of the inhabitants, the country was not ripe for the well meant but mis-taken legislation of 1855, and will not be so, I icai, for many years

That legislation has already resulted in great political evils, and the sooner it is amended the better. The existence of a large body of once prosperous landowners and tenants who, if they have not lost their lands, are reduced to the position of bond-slaves to the bunniah, is a standing danger.

But the utility of the suggestions now made to improve this state of things appears to me questionable. All money-lenders are not village Shylocks. Many, I would say most of them, fulfil a very need function in the existing state of society, and I much fear that it the proposals of the Government of India in their present form be adopted, a wide door will be opened to fraud on the part of borrowers, much harassing civil litigation will result, and credit will be shaken.

The suggested reforms of the law seem to me too vague. definite rules for the guidance of the Courts are required. My idea is that it ought to be charted that when the amount of interest sought to be recovered exceeds the principal, or when the rate of neterest exceeds, say 24 per cent, per annum for simple bonds, and 12 per cent, for mortgage bonds, a Court may go behind the strict terms of the bond, and enquire whether there was any undue influence in the case. I do not think any amendment of the Evidence Act is required. As matters at present stand it is open to a determine a though the problems with the problems w detendant, although he may have in the bond or before a registration officer admitted receipt of consideration passed.

I would invite attention to the observations of Mr. Nicholls Judge of Moradabad. Mr. Nicholls is not raising any theoretical objections, but is speaking from his experience as Manager of the extensive Awa Estates, and from what has come before me as a Civil Judge, I know he is right. It is not only the risk of losing his money altogether which makes a creditor ask high interest. The of money altogether which makes a creditor ask high interest. The difficulty and expense of recovering it, even when he has got a decree, are factors which must enter into his calculations. It was too much the custom formerly for Civil Courts to look on execution business as a mere paretgon. I am glad that this spirit is now passing away, and Subordinate Courts are now devoting more time and care to the work of the execution department. But it is unquestionable that the charges at every stage of the execution proceedings are much too high when the amount to be recovered is small, and thus come to be either prohibitive or are the laterague. ceedings are much too high when the amount to be recovered is small, and thus come to be either prohibitive, or are the last straw which breaks the back of the judgment-debior. I am very strong-ly of opinion that the charges for issue of notices, proclamations, &c., require to be more graduated than they are at present. This would not require legislation, but I am finily persuaded that if it were carried out it would have the ultimate effect of reducing the rate of interest.

I would invite attention to one other matter, though it is only I would marte attention to one other matter, and that is the indirectly connected with the usury question, and that is the advisability of placing greater restrictions on the transfer of land from the land-owning and land-cultivating classes. It is generally admitted that the provisions of sections 320 to 327 inclusive of the Code of Civil Procedure have not been found in practise at all adequate to effect the object with which they were enacted.

Last year this Court in a Full Bench decision to which I was a party held that a tenant with rights of oc upaner is at liberty to mortgage his holding. This finding was inevitable as the law at present stands, but I would gladly see the law attered so as to forbid mortgages of such holdings, and place restrictions on their subletting.

The Registrar of the High Court, in forwarding these Minutes to Government, says :---

THE HIGH COURT'S OPINIONS

It is the opinion of the whole Court that interest in excess of principal should never be decreed (the damdopat rule), and that in applying that rule the principal from time to time advanced, whether under one bond or under honds merged in a subsequent bond, should be ascertained separately from the interest, no matter whether or not it was agreed between the parties that interest should be treated as principal.

The Court believes that the custom of damdopat is known, and would commend itself, to the people; it would be no hardship to apply it to Hindus whose old custom it was; it would be no hardship to apply it to Muhammadans to whose religion it is contrary to lend money at interest.

The Judges are unanimously of opinion that where the interest is compound or exceeds 12 per centum per annum, either the law should make it incumbent on the lender to prove that the transaction was fair and reasonable, or the discretion of requiring such proof should be vested in the Judge, whether the borrower has raised the aucstion or not.

THE N. W. P. GOVERNMENT'S SUMMING UP. In a letter to the Government of India, the Secretary to Government, North-West Provinces and Oudh, writes :--

As regards the question of legislation for the purpose of checking the exaction of exorbitant interests, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner cordially endorses the opinion of the majority of officers consulted, that section 2 of Act XXVIII of 1855 requires modification in order to compel Courts to exercise discretion in awarding interest at the rate stipulated for in a contract which is such as to raise a reasonable suspicion of coercion, undue influence, fraud, or misrepresentation. He is not, however, prepared to agree with the majority of the Judges of the High Court in holding that in cases where interest is compound or exceeds 12 per cent, per annum, the Courts should inrther be called upon to presume, or at least to enquire suo motu into the existence of coercion, &c. It might lead to grave injustice to enforce a rule depending on a rate of interest which, though ordinarily suitable enough for mortgage bonds, might be inapplicable in the case of borrowers who have no security to offer and often very indifferent credit.

The proposed amendments to the Contract Act to provide that the taking an undue advantage of a debtor shall render au agreement voidable, appear desirable; and, as a consequence of the foregoing proposals, it would be necessary to add to the Evidence Act pro-visions empowering Courts to go behind a boud when its terms are exorbitant and unconscionable

Several officers, relying on the old rule of damdopat, suggest that Courts, besides being required to exercise discretion in the matter of awarding interest, should also be precluded from awarding of awarding interest, should also be precluded from awarding more than twice the amount of the original debt. This question is raised in the Bill to regulate the award of interest in suits for simple money debts and morigage debts, on which the opinion of this Government is desired in letter No. 388, dated 13th March 1895, from the Legislative Department, and will be dealt with on receipt of the replies of the officers consulted. I am to suggest, for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, that it would be convenient to dispose of this point at the same time as those dealt with in the foregoing datagraphs of this letter. foregoing paragraphs of this letter.

SEVEN POUNDS IN ONE WEEK.

NOT every man who is thin would thank you for fattening him. He doesn't want to be fat and for very good reasons. Unnecessary fat is a load to carry about; it interferes with a man's power to work, shortens his wind, and dulls his wits.

load to carry anony; it intereses this wind, and dulls his wits.

Yet, on the other hand, a certain amount of flesh is needed for he oth and comfort. For example A man five feet high should weight about 120lbs, and man five feet six miches, 145lbs, a man six feet, 178lbs. It is a regular ascending scale. The insurance companies allow a variation of 7 per cent above or below it, and beyond those limits charge an extra premium. One shouldn't be much over or indicated his proper weight if he waits to be sound and hearty—and we all do want that.

Now we will tell you how Mi. Thomas Crosby, being under weight, gimed seven pointed in a week. He had lost 1/5 stone, which is foo much off for a man who wis never festine than he naturally ought to be. It was this way. He was right enough up to May, 1891. At that time he began to feel til and out of soits. He had a nasty taste in his month—like noten eggs, he says—and a thick, shiny stuff came on his gimis and teeth. His appetite failed, and what he did eat was, as you might say, under compulsion; and right afterwards he would have great point in that region. He was often dizzy, and cold chilts tan over him as though he were threatened with fever. Of course we should expect a man who is handled in this way to lose strength. In fact, he got so weak and nervous that he shook all over, and him.

over, and his hands trembled as if a current of electricity were infinitely through him.

To use his own words: "I rapidly lost flesh, was 1/2 stone lighter, and could hardly walk about. Once my parents thought I was dying, and sent in haste for the doctor. I saw two doctors in Epworth and one at Haxey, but they were not able to help me. Our vicer, Rev. Mi Overton, recommended me to the Lincola Infimiary, where I attended for eight weeks as an outdoor parient, without benefit.

"Soon afterwards Mr. Sharp, a chemist, at Epworth, spoke to me of the virtues of a medicine known as A. other Seigel's Curaive Syring. Being interested in what he sand, I left off trying other things and began taking this Syring. In a few days I felt better, and presently I gained seven pounds in a week. At that late I soon got back to my work, and have had the best of health ever since. I tell these facts to everyholdy, and am perfectly writing they should be published. Yours truly (Signed), Tost CROSM; Ferry Road, Epworth, vio Doncaster, December 23rd, 1892."

After reading Mr. Crosby's stony we scarcely need to ask why he lost flesh. The inmine he stopped enting and digesting his usual allowance of food he began to fall away. Trees, they say, grow as much from the air by means of their leaves, as they do from the sool. But men don't. They've got to be built up through their stomachs. Indigestion and dyspepsia (Mr. Crosby's complaint) stops this process and poisons hose who have it, besides. That accounts for all the painful and dangerons symptoms our friend speaks of. The doctors do what they can, but, unluckily, they don't possess the medicine that goes to the bottom of this disease and cures it. The temedy is Mother Seigel's Curaive Syrup, and nothing else, so far as we know. I restores digestion, and digestion covers the bones with fat enough for health and good looks.

October II, 1492.--*As the evening darkened, Columbus took his station on the top of the castle or cabin, on the high pono of his vessel. However he might carry a cheerful and confident commenance during the day, it was to him a time of the most painful auxiety, and now, when he was wrapped from observation by the shades of night, he maintained an intense and unientiting watch, ranging his eye along the dusky horizon in search of the most vague indications of land. Suddenly, about ten o'clock, he thought he beheld i light glimmering at a distance. Fearing that his eager hippes might deceive him, he called to Pedra Guiterrez, gentleman of the king's bedchamber, and inquired whether he saw a light in that direction; the latter replied in the affirmative. Columbus, yet doubtful whether it might not be some delusion of the fancy, called Raderigo Sanchez of Segovia, and made the some inquiry. By the time the latter had ascended the roundhouse, the light had disappeared. They saw it once or twice afterwards in sudden and passing gleams, as if it were a touch in the bark of a fisherman rising and guiking with the waves, or in the hand of some person on shore, borne up and down as he walked from house to house. So transient and uncertain were these gleams, this few attached any importance to them; Columbus, however, considered them as certain signs of land, and, moreover, that the land was inhabited."—Ivin's Columbus, he 3 of Angist, 1492, early in the morning, that Columbus set sail on his first voyage of discovery. He departed from the bar of Siltes, a small island in front of the town of Hielva, steering in a south-westerly direction, "&c.-Irving. He was about fifty-seven years old the year of the discovery.

 On the 13th September, in the evening, being about two hundred leagues from the island of Ferro, he, for the first time, noticed the variation of the needle, a phenomenon which had never before been remarked. Struck with the circumstance, be observed it attentively for three days, and found that the variation increased as he advanced. It soon attracted the attention of the pilots, and filled them with consternation. It seemed as if the very laws of nature were changing as they advanced and that they were entering another world subject to unknown influences."—Irving.

Are we to suppose that Government proposes to reduce railway accidents by encouraging life insurance? For the last four years, the number of accidents were seven for every 100,000 train-miles run. During 1894, the number of persons killed were 633 and injured 929.

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS.

PARLIAMENT was dissolved on Monday. It will meet, after the elections, on the 12th of August. Prior to the protogation, Lord Salisbury delivered a manifesio defending the House of Lords and declaring that the policy of Government would be to do the utmost to unugate the misery of the millions. Agriculture, he said, had suffered especially, but the reforms in taxation, facilities of transport, and the creation of small holdings would do much to relieve it. Mareover, the poor law required revision. The election seems to be a tome affoir. Meetings are, indeed, being held daily in different parts of the country, and speeches made by candidates, but there is an absence of any excitement. One hundred and thirty-eight seats will be unopposed. The candidates will be divided simply into Unionisis and Liberals, the more precise sub-division being reserved for the mush. Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, has been returned for the Ealing Division of Middlesex, anopposed. The following Unionist Members have been re-elected in the same way, namely, Mr. Goschen for St. George's, Hanover Square; Mr. Myers for Winchester; Mr. Lyttleton for Warwick; Mr. Tardell for Paddington ; Mr. Barry for Windsor ; Mr. Hoare for Hampstead and Hanson and Mr. Gibbs for the City of London. Lord Chailes Beresford is severely censured for persisting in contesting a seat for Central Birnungham against the Unionist candidate. The Liberal programme was sketched out by Lord Rosebery, who, speaking at a Liberal meeting in the Albert Hall, advocated continuity in the foreign affairs of the nation, and said that his policy was to withdraw the forces from Chural as soon as the sten could be taken with safety. With regard to the Armenian question he would insist upon due guarantees against the recurrence of the horrors committed by the Turks at Sassoon-In conclusion he reaffirmed the principle of Home Rule, but said that the question of the abolition of the House of Lords was at the root of all others. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking at Lambeth in support of

Mr. H. M. Stanley, the explorer, sketched the Government programe. He stated that it was their intention to assist friendly societies, to make provision for the aged paor, and to control the immigration of destinue aliens, and also the importation of foreign prison-made goods, and to compensate more dworkness.

The fournal de St. Petersburg, discussing the loan, disavows any wish for political advantage, ascribing it to Russia's desire to maintain friendly relations with her great neighbour. This assurance of the Russian journal is immediately followed by the English Standard, with a telegram from Berlin positively be-affirming that the extension of the Siberian railway through Manchuria has been definitely agreed upon. The exclusiveness of China is attacked from other quarters as well. THE high prospects of petroleum in Assam have not been realized. The boring operations of the Assam Railways and Trading Company at Mikum have been stopped since September last Altogether nine bore holes were put down to various depths but without satisfactory results. On January 19, we commented rather sharply on the circular of the Inspector General of Registration, Bengal, directing that peons do int form part of an office establishment and requiring the rural subregistrars, who are paid by commissions on the registrations effected and allowances on the documents received by them, to strictly account for the money drawn on the list account. It is now our pleasing duty to announce that the objectionable circular has been withdrawn. The present Inspector-General thinks "that rural sub-registrais are neither losers not gamers in the long run under the arrangement which gives them a fixed scale of allowance. Circular No. 42 of 1894 is accordingly cancelled." The withdrawing circular is numbered 17 of 1895. If the preceding orders of Khan Bahadur Delawar Hossem Ahmed are as sympathetic, or the subsequent ones leave the ill-paid toril sub-registrars undisturbed, he will have earned then thanks before he lays down his office. For the present order, they are grateful to him for no positive good done but for the evil averted. If he can improve their status, he will earn the thanks of the general community.

SIR Charles Elliott has given an impetus to the Mahomedan Hostel in Calcutta which had been hanging fire or rather awaiting subscriptions. Without waiting till the last, he has given orders for its construction and sanctioned the Government grant of Rs. 50,000. We have received a communication on the subject. We have much pleasure in presenting the enlightened Mahomedan feeling on the subject of boarding houses for boys.

Sir Charles Elliott has conferred a boon upon the Mahomedan community by sanctioning the Hostel in the vicinity of the Caclutta Medressa. Such a boarding house was a desideratum. Calcutta has many educational advantages. They are not all unmixed good. As in other large cuies, the dangers are many that surround a young student without proper supervision and control. There was a time when many well-to-do Mahomedan gentlemen in and around Calcutta, according to the prevailing custom, used to maintain a number of poor students in their houses. The heads of such families would exercise some kind of supervision also and act the part of guardians, Old times are changed; old views of charity and liberality have taken a new direction. At the present day it will be difficult to find half a dozen houses where poor students have free lodging and mess (Jagir). Not to speak of strangers, few can afford to keep their relations in their houses and support them, or educate their children, The great misfortune of an Indian student is the home influence. Considering all the circumstance, it cannot be said to be healthy. It is evident that in most houses there is want of discipline and proper supervision of health and habits of the boys. Then again the gnardians are so much occupied with their profession or business that they have no time to attend to their wards. Female influence is worse than anything. The ladies love their children indiscriminately and thus spoil the boys by granting them every license and showing them every indulgence. Grown up boys are also petted like young children. In well-regulated English homes, the model of discipline and good training, it is thought necessary to remove the boys at a certain age.

Why the result of our university education is so bad and disappointing? Why our students cannot turn out as brilliantly as educated Europeans? Why they look like so many discharged patients after their college career? Why are they wanting in strength of character, as of body? I attribute all these shortcomings to the absence of discipline of good boarding schools and colleges as we find in Europe. The sourier we can change the piesent system, the better for all concerned.

No amount of lecturing will remove the defects of character which cause much anxiety.

A student, who after passing his F. A. or B. A. examination does not know how to eat and dress and is a picture of ill-health and of all distempers arising from it, what can be expected of him? He would have been a different man and useful if he had the supervision of teachers who could set him personal examples and exercise on him lasting healthy influence.

The Mahomedan community ought to be indebted to the Lieutenant-Governor for the good done by him for their young mental they should liberally response to his call and make up the balance still wanting. They must realise the importance and advantages of hostels for their student population who require them most.

What a student can learn in years in his house he learns it in months in a boarding school with competent principals and super-intendents.

The conditions under which poor students are compelled to live at Patna, Calcutta and Dacca are fraught with danger to their physical and moral welfare. There are many who suffer seriously from the baueful influence of their questionable surroundings. It is too late when their guardians are informed of their having been plunged into troubles. These students are not properly housed and they get bad food, bad water, bad light, and bad association, the combined effect of which very often proves their rum.

FOLLOWING the Mahomedan Lucrary Society which early enough saw the benefit of the Hostel, the National Mahomedan Society has voted a sum towards its construction. Their labours must not end there. The individual members must come forward each with his mute. The estimated cost of land and binding is about a lakh of rupees. The subscriptions come up to only Rs. 19,000.

THE Calculta Gizette, of July 10, announces that the services of recognition of his greatness, had voted a statue and an address in bave been dispensed with by Government, with effect from the 15th March 1895 We paulish, in mother column, the Resolution on the subject. Charles Appears We at Fordy e was admitted into service on the 27th January 1887. He must have been considered then engible both on account of character and capabilities. It took eight long years to discover that he was not deserving of the choice of Government. But for the Dacca pleaders he would have gone on pilong up crone from the vantage ground of his position in the service. All honour to them! Sir Charles Elliott too deserves commendation for the strong action he has taken. He gave Mr. Fordyce sufficient apportunity to clear houself, and finding him fail, the charges against him having been reported true, the Governor has not been slow to purge the subordinate executive service of the Fordyce fonliness.

in connection with the knighthood conferred on Mr. J. Cowasjee Jehanger, the Times of India says that "It is understood, however, that in conferring a knighthood upon Mr. Jehangir regard has been had to the manificent benefactions bestowed upon Bombay by the late Sir Cowasjee Jehanger, who gave nearly fifteen lakhs for various public objects, and who shoully before his death, it was reported at the time, was recommended by the Government of Bombay for an even more distinguished mark of the favour of the Crown." The present honour, it also says, " has followed quickly upon the opening of the Readymoney wing of the Imperial Institute, which has been exected at a cost of two lakhs of rupees, the gift of Mi. Jehangit."

The present Sir Cowasjee Jehangii Readymoney is the adopted son and successor of the late Sn. Convasjee Jehangir Readymoney. In 1878, when noticing his death, elsewhere in another capacity, we wrote .-

'A great man, (4s our readers are already aware) "the venerable philanthropist," "the Peabody of the Eist," Sir Cowasji Jehangir Readymoney, Koight, C. S. I., has passed away. In the following Gazette Extraordinary the Bombay Government thus regret his

"It is with deep regret that the Governor in Council has received mtelligence of the death at an early hour this morning of Sir Cowasji Jehangir Readymoney, Ki., C. S. I.

Remembering the munificent charities and benefactions with which Sir Cowaspi's name has been connected during the past quarter of a century, the Government consider that this public recognition of his worth is pre-emmently called for.

" By his death the Government has lost one of its most loyal subjects, India a generous benefactor, and the Tuwn and Island of Bombay one ofats most apright and independent citizens."

Su Cowaspi's greatness lay in his benefactions for the relief of human suffering and himan distress without distinction of creed or coloni. His public charities amounted to eighteen lakhs and his private charities to four lakhs of Rupees. How he valued public marities the following characteristic letter will shew :-

Out of respect to the memory of Sir Cowasji, many of the Parsi inps, schools, and places of business in Bombay, as well as the share Ear and Elphilstone College were closed on the day of his death. he Banks also suspended business the next day for one hour. In

Sir Cowasji. We are not told whether they intend to raise a monument to his memory after death. If they have exhausted the memorials to the great man whose statue already admins the 'Sr Cowasp Jehango Hill of the University of Bomboy," they may gloufy his virtues in his adopted son and successor. Such a precedent was laid down by Sir Richard Temple at the distribution of Famore honours in Bengal. Titles in advance were gratited for the heirs of benefactors and benefactresses of Bengal F onoic sufferers."

The honour for the son comes too late, but after an expenditure in public of half the amount of the fither in privite charity. The adoption of the fither's name has been justified. It remains for the son to win the other title, or a baronetcy to perpetrate the name. We live in cheap times. If he only sticks to it and lives, he is sure to get it.

KHAJA SELIMULLA has given up the Government service the inles whereof had been relaxed to admit him. This is the second time that he throws up his appointment. Once he had overstayed his leave. But he was re-gazetted. This time, we believe, he has resigned deliberately. He has made his peace with his father, on whose bounty he means to throw himself, his two wives and about half a dozen of children. The Government pittance was not enough for so many in their position m society. Khajah Sehm is only 26 years of age and is reported to be an angel of a man. We will be glad to hear that he is given his proper place in the new Nawabate of Dacca

THE Dacca Division has failed to elect its member for the Bengal Legislative Council N a that there were no candidates. The four District Boards had appointed from delegates and these from gentlemen had so evenly balanced then judgments that they could not come to a definite conclusion. Fom names in two sets were proposed, and each time found equal supporters, there being a tie on both the occasions. There were thus four candidates, that is one for each delegate. Dacca is a go-ahead and intelligent division, and it is to be deplored that the first exercise of the franchise fails there. Under the rules, it is open to the Lieutenant Gavernor to make the nomingtion himself. But the power is not absolute. He is not precluded from giving the District Boards, another opportunity of exercising, the hard-earned privilege. When a pers in recommon led is not acceptable to the Lieutenant Governor, he is to order another election under the rules. Considering that it is the first occasion when the recommending delegates could not ignee, the Local Government intry, without any impropriety, rather with good grace, give a second chance. By their obstinacy the delegates have undoubtedly proved themselves unfit. But it is the roles more than the representatives that are to blame. A rule that lays down in even number without a second or casting vote is bad ab initio, and Government is responsible for it, If the delegates have proved perverse, let them be re-elected. Let it not be said of Dacca that it is not worthy of the privilege.

In making his own monimation, the Lieutenant Governor occurs a serious responsibility. For he most choose "a person belonging to the class which the body or association or group is deemed to represent." It is only when that body or group absolutely fail that the right is to be taken from them and exercised on their behalf. It is competent to the Lieutenant Governor to reject as often as he pleases a recommendation. Why should ne then limit a bidy empowered by law to make the reconstruction to one appartmenty? If the foor persons named at the meeting of the delegates are not acceptable to the Dacca people in general as represented by the nonlinees of the District Boards of the Division, there are others who may gim their confidence. At any rate, let not the sins of their delegates be visited on the electing Boards.

POLICE reports and Givernment resolutions say that in Bengal, when the rice-crop fails, certain crimes, especially dacting and nobbery, increase. A proportion seems to be muntained between increase of robbery and decrease in the production of the stable grain. The inference, therefore, is that robbery is directly induced by honger. Climatic influences then, or the clouds, are responsible for the crime, do what the Police, which is otherwise highly efficient, might, Considering, however, the features of certain crimes and taking into 72 the good people of Bombay, in discharge of their duties and in account the national character of the people, we are unable to accept this fashionable explanation. The fact is, the existence of a criminal population in Bengal, as in other provinces of India, cannot be denied. For the most part the villages of Bengal are quite unprotected. The low-paid village chowkidars are an exceedingly worthless set of men. Insufficient as their number is, compared with the extent of their beats, it would be something if they were regular in their nightly rounds. Irregularity, however, is the rule with them. During the dark formight, they seldom go out, or if they leave their beds, it is for the shortest time possible. Robbers of kinds, from those who are content with things of hitle value temptingly exposed in unhedged gurdens or numbled houses, to those who make secret and burglations entries into houses or invade them openly and in numbers, well or ill armed with offensive weapons, are free to ply their respective vocations without let or hindrance. The Bengali is generally thind. Surprised in the midst of his sleep by a number of armed men ready to treat him and his very roughly if he does not surrender his valuables, and well knowing that none of his neighbours would come forward with any assistance, he becomes utterly helpless add unresisting. It should be remembered, however, that they who commit dacomes are Bengalis. If convict returns be studied, these men will generally appear to belong to the lowest castes, such as Bagdis, Domes, Pods, Chandals, Teors, Kauras, with here and there a high caste individual who, without actually assisting the attacks on houses, keeps the gang together, directs its operations, disposes of the plander and distributes the proceeds. The villagers know who amongst them live by stealing and dacoity. Only they have not the courage to denounce them. If they do, there is no end of trouble for them. In the first place, enough evidence would be wanting. Then they would incur the penalty of having brought a serious charge against a subject who is entitled to all the protection that the law can afford. Listly, the denonneed individual hunself is sure to take vengeance. The sufest course, therefore, of maintaining a thorough silence is adopted. The dacoits themselves very generally act with prudence. They commit their depredations in villages distant from their own, so that it is the interest of no body who knows them to utter even a breath of suspicion. The Thuggi Commission had acted on different principles. Individuals who had no ostensible means of livelihood or who were denounced by half-a-dozen respectable neighbours as craminals were lodged in the goal. The result was most satisfactory. For some years after the Commission had closed its labours, the crime of dacoity and highway tobbery and even petty thefts, were practically stamped out of the country. Property became safe. Those who through the leniency of neighbours were not incarcercated gave up their criminal practices and settled dawn either as peaceful cultivators or daylabouters or as chowkidars in private employ. Seeing that cases of daconty occur in even the metropolitan districts of Bengal, the cry is general for a return to the days of the Thuggi Commission. Doubtless, some innocent men would suffer if general repute were to settle the question of guit. But the percentage would be very large of real criminals being spotted and lodged in prison so that property would once more be safe in the mofussil. Vigarous measures are loudly called for,

MAHENDRA LAI. SIRCAR, M.D.,

Honorary Secretary.

It will not do for the administration to sit with folded hands and say that it is the failure of the staple crop that is responsible for the increase of robbery.

THE little market town of Janai in Sub-division Serampore, is one of those few places within the metropolitan districts which is inhabited by a community owning social allegiance to Brahman chiefs. Janai has a higher class English School which traces its origin to prenurversny days and which had the Hon'ble J. E. D. Bethune for its patron. That great educationist had honomied this village with two visits, wading on the first occasion through water and mile almost knee-deep and extending over a mile along a pathway branching off from the old Benaies Road. In later times, Janai was visited, among others, by such persons connected with the Education Department as Dr. Monat, Mr. Sutcliffe, Mr. Grapel, the Rev. Dr. Kaye, Mt. Pratt, Mr. Woodrow, Mr. Atkinson, and Mr. George Smith (afterwards of the Friend of India), Mr. Sime, and Mr. Trafford of Serampore. Mr. Sutcliffe, in particular, was struck by the fact of the class-rolls of the school numbering none but Mookeriees and Baneriees and Chatterjees and Gangulies with a sprinking of only Ghoses and Boses and Mitters and Dutts. The system of education followed in the Janai school and which gave it a disunctive feature before the influence of the Calcutta University brought all educational institutions in Bengal to a dead level, was the Training system inaugurated at Glasgow by Daivd Stowe. Its peculiarity consisted in the simultaneous training of the intellectual, the moral, and the physical powers of the boy. After the establishment of the Calcutta University and the high-pressure teaching it has brought in its train, the Janas-school lost its individuality though it maintained its ground tolerably well, measuring its efficiency by its success in the public examinations. Through causes that have no interest for the public a split arose in the managing committee, with the result that a new school was established at Payaragacha within half a mile. The Payaragacha school proved a vigouious youngster, for its success in the University examinations was decidedly marked, considering the difficulties which it had to encounter. So far as strength of rolls, however, was concerned, both the schools suffered, for the school-going population of the neighbourhood is not large enough to support two rival institutions. After more than six years of separate existence, through the efforts of Babu Abmash Chandra Mookerjee of the well-known Mookeriee family of Janai, the new school has been amalgamated with the old one. The committee of management have been enlarged by the accession of many new members, and it is expected that the amalgamated school will once more take its proper position in the list of such institutions in the metropolitan District. Among other reforms the committee have announced the intention of admitting Mussalman children, of whom about a dozen are already on the rolls. There was a good gathering of the local gentry on the occasion and all the speakers who addressed the meeting cordially thanked Babu Abinash Chandra for his unremitting labours, extending over a year, in bringing about so desirable a result. There can be no doubt that those well-tn-do gentlemen of the neighbourhood who have removed their children from Japan to Calcutta will send them back to their own school. Many of these boys distinguish themselves highly in the University Examinations, credit being taken by those schools which send them up, although the Janai school has the honour of grounding their education.

THE CHEAP DEFENCE OF THE NATION. It is ten years that Captain Andrew Hearsey conceived his idea of a cheap Reserve for the Indian Army. The first occasion on which he spoke out was at the Reception given him by the India Club shortly after his prosecution, by Mr. Laidman, I.C.S., on a charge of defamation. It is a matter of history that that prosecution ended in a miserable fiasco. In replying to the kind sentiments expressed at the Reception, the Captain pointed out how useful the troops of the Native States could, under proper training, be made in the defence of the Indian Empire. He was cheered for the idea, and requested to publish his scheme.

When, in 1886, the Captain wrote his pamphlet on "Army Reorganization with special reference to the question of a Reserve for the Indian Army," the Indian Army had no reserve. Now it has a reserve of 75,000 men fully equal in every respect to the regular Native Infantry, which force, again, in time of need. could easily be raised to 3,50,000. The Reserves have already proved their fitness as soldiers in the recent Chitral campaign. The pamphlet was given a cold reception in India. The prejudice against the writer proved prejudicial to it. They kept a discreet silence over it, probably because,

1. The advice and recommendations had not been put forward by any of the heads of the Military,

Political, or Financial Departments.

2. The recommendations had been put forward by a poor and retired officer.

Captain Hearsey was not, however, deterred by this show of neglect. He knew the strength of his cause. The pamphlet was largely circulated in the European countries. The press of France, Austria and Germany spoke favourably of the Captain's suggestions. Much amusement was caused in India by the first lines of an article in one of the French journals in which the writer confounded the Captain's place of residence in India, Mussooree in the Himalayas, with Missuri in America.

Considering the egregious blunders Anglo-Indians make, this mistake of the French editor was pardonable.

The knowing Anglo-Indians in India, who, reflecting the policy of the Government of the day, would not see any good in the pamphlet, and who probably predicted a failure of the cause from the geographical ignorance of those who saw much in it, were disappointed. The notices in the Continental papers attracted the attention of the Secretary of State for India, who ordered copies of the pamphlet, and enquired of the Government of India as to the practicability of its recommendations. It is not to be supposed that the Indian press was entirely silent. Such of the editors to whom the name of the Captain is enough to rake up all bile and uncharitableness had denounced the scheme as chimerical.

Lord Dufferin was not a Viceroy to be scared away by interested denunciation or sounding phrases. Finding the suggestions valuable, he called for opinions, Before he laid down the reins of Government he had announced, at Patiala, in the cold weather of 1888, the acceptance of the offers of help from Native Princes and the organization of the Imperial Service Troops. General Sir George Greaves, subsequently Commander-in-Chief, Bombay, and Sir Herbert Macpherson, Commander-in-Chief, Madras, both personal friends of Captain Hearsey, were already familiar with his views. The first, when asked, thought very highly of the scheme, while the second said that there was a great deal in the suggestion. The pamphlet must have impressed the Duke of Connaught for he soon after supported the recommendation for the formation of a Military College for the better instruction of Native officers of the Indian Army.

True it is that Load Roberts, the Commander-in-Chief, was about this time considering the different from the Captain's. He had in view the reserve of the British Army in England, a system not suited to India, and which, if applied to India, would have considerably swelled the military budget which already swallows a large portion of the revenues. Finding the Hearsey scheme eminently practical, the Commander-in-Chief dropped his. He, moreover, from Rangoon where he was touring, sent to Captain Hearsey a complimentary letter of thanks for the pamphlet and, what was more, for the valuable suggestions it contained.

Besides the enrolment of the Feudatories' troops as a reserve, the pamphlet recommended the throwing open the military Order of the Victoria Cross to our sepoys. There was no reason why the Indian black soldiers' claim to this much valued decoration should not be recognized, when Germans, Frenchmen, Spaniards, Italians, Americans and all other nationalities serving in the British army or navy were free to win it.

It may fairly be said that the Government of India have benefitted much by Captain Hearsey's valuable advice and suggestions, not only politically but also financially. Yet, we regret to observe, that that Government have not so much or so little as thanked the Captain for what he has done for the Indian Empire. When he was not deemed worthy of even bare thanks, it was out of the question to find his name in the recent honours list as a kind of recognition of the strength he has added to the Empire—a force capable of immediate expansion. If the Captain had been a subject of any of the European Continental Powers, we make no doubt, he would have long reaped his reward. Any other but he would have been duly honoured. The Captain bears an odious name, and the Government of India are wise:

Now there was a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered a city, yet no man remembered the same poor man.

Then, said I, wisdom is better than strength; nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised and his words not heard.

The words of a wise man are heard in quiet more than the cry of him that ruleth fools.

Wisdom is better than weapons of war.

We may mention that the views of Captain Hearsey originally appeared in these columns on the 6th November, 1886, under the heading "The Cheap Defence of the Nation," with which also we head this article. The Captain has made a further suggestion, in a letter which will be found in our last issue. It requires careful consideration.

THE SENSITIVENESS OF POETS.

Love of fame is strong in every breast. The higher the sphere of life, the more ambitious the scheme for its gratification. It is, again, guilty or innocent, according to the character of that scheme. Genghiz Khan or Tamerlane, raising pyramids of human heads as trophics of every new conquest, acted as much from desire of fame as any other crowned head whose beneficence to mankind shines from the pages of history. Universal though the passion is, its gratification depends more on luck than wisdom and exertion. It has been said that if Casar and Cromwell had exchanged countries or ages, the one would have been a pious centurion and the other the sheriff of his county. The same cannot be said of poets. Horace, if born in England, would have sung as well in English as he has in Latin. Hatez, if born in India, would have produced as fine verses in Sanskrit as his own songs in Persian.

When luck proves adverse and the desire of fame is not gratified, the disappointment acts differently on different minds. The question of a reserve for the Indian Army. But weak are cured of the desire itself. Not so the strong. A the lines on which he meant to proceed were mountain current, opposed by a boulder, either washes it down or overleaps it in fary. Memorable were Distacli's words upon the failure of his first speech in Parliament. He lived to make good his prediction. His success was complete and both Houses did afterwards listen to him with rapt attention. Poets are peculiarly sensitive. Every member of the brotherhood thinks that he is deserving of applause for every trifle he puts forth. Contemporary readers are generally unwilling to acknowledge such pretensions. It is interesting to note the frame of mind of different poets of different climes and ages upon finding the world unwilling to endorse their own estimate of their genius. Some become so depressed as to absolutely give up courting the Muses. Some fret and fume, calling the world names. Some have been known to have burnt their writings in rage, resolved to deprive the world of their pleasure. Others, however, conscious of their own powers, have waited with unruffled minds, strong in the conviction that the time would come when their writings would be appreciated and their images placed in the temple of fame. They have even rebuked the world with grave dignity. We will first name Bhavabhuti. Finding himself neglected, and probably lashed by the critics of the day, the great Sanskrit dramatist, conscious of his genius, retaliated on those who disregarded or found fault with him. His vengeance was not characterised by the malice of a Pope or the audacity of a Dryden. It was not even a dignified prayer after Milton for a fit audience though few. It was a proud self-assertion of power, a withering contempt for his detractors, a calm expectation of appreciation by a kindred spirit born or to be born. It was no attempt to represent hostile critics or more favoured authors as princes of bores deserving to rule a kingdom of dunces. Here is how the poet nobly rebuked an unappreciating world :---

Ye nama kechidiba nab prathayantyavajnam, Jananti te kimapi tan prati naisha yatnah ; Utpatsyatesti mama kopi samanadharma, Kalobyam niravadbirvipula cha prithen.

"Those men who express a disregard for us, know very little; this effort is not for them. There may arise in the future, or there may be at the present moment, some one with accomplishments equal to mine (and, therefore, capable of appreciating me), for time is eternal, and the world very wide."

In the entire range of literature, eastern or western, there is, perhaps, not another instance of similar pride and reliance on one's own merits, barring a very poor effort in an obscure quarter in consequence of which Bhavabhuti can no longer be said to enjoy the singular glory of having cherished such sentiments. It was reserved for the anthor, extensively nuknown, of Bungadbipaparajaya to adopt the verses of the great Brahman poet on the reverse of his title-page.

The pride displayed by Bhavabhuti in his Uttara-charita was scarcely less audacions though it involved no rebuke to anybody. There he calls himself a Brahman whom the goddess of speech follows as an obedient wife. Kalidasa was cast in a different mould. That prince of dramatists, who has eclipsed the fame of all Indian poets before him or after, and who is inferjor to no poet in at least the culling of all that is beautiful in nature, finding himself contemned, gently remonstrated with the world, only to teach not to reprove it for its fully. In the prologue of his Malazikágnimitra, he says:---

> Puránamityeva na sádhu sarvam, Nachápi kávyam navamityavadyam ; Santah parikshyanyatarad bhanjante, Mudah parapratyayaneyabudhih.

" All that is old is not good; nor is a poem, that is new, faulty. The wise prefer this or that after adequate examination. The fool, however, suffers his understanding to be led by the beliefs of other people,"

Entering the field of English literature, we notice the same regard of the world or the censures cast upon them. Disappointed of fame, though none so worthy of it as he, Milton spoke of fame as the last infirmity of noble mind. His prayer to the Muse for a fit audience though few, was prompted by his own gentle nature. The humility and modesty of Goldsmith was proverbial. Finding how contemporary poetry was looked upon in his day, he wrote in his Traveller of merit as "weeping unknown." Though he was greeted, on the publication of that poem, with a sair measure of praise, yet it was much less than what he had expected. Hence his fine apostrophe to Poetry at the conclusion of his Deserted Village. The sentiments were his, though the lines are believed to have been polished by his friend Johnson. It is an humble converse between the Muse and her votary, without abuse of any body in which the votary pours out his heart to the listening goddess. Cowper, too, had to complain of neglect. The poet of Onley was too shy to earn any sort of notoriety by those vulgar arts which are sometimes practised by even men of merit when the game is the acquisition of fame. He had praised Chatham. But Chatham did nothing for him. He was not at all sorry for the neglect of the great. This, however, 1s his reproof for those who were unwilling to judge of him by his merits, and who, in according praise, were led either by idleness, or by sound and fury, instead of sense.

Some to the fascination of a name Surrender judgment haodwink'd. Some the style Infatnates, and through labyrinths and wilds Of error leads them, by a tune entranc'd. While sloth seduces more, too weak to bear The insupportable fatigue of thought; And swallowing therefore without pause or choice The total grist unsifted, husks and all.

Cowper has very successfully hit some of the weaknesses of humanity in this passage. Byron's was a keenly sensitive and rebellious nature. The child who could not bear the chidings of a mother was not likely to put up with the lash of the critic. Accordingly, when his juvenile poems were harshly reviewed in the great literary periodical of the day,---the notice was from the caustie pen of Brougham, -- the whole force of Byron's mind was roused. Without being at all depressed, he was filled with indignation, and the result was one of the keenest satires in the English language which the poet in after years wished to suppress.

THE FOR DYCE RESOLUTION.

Read,---Government Resolution No. 1989 J., dated 9th April Reag, Gorennien a Commission for the purpose of enquiry into charges of corruption which had been brought against Mr. C. A. W. Fordyce, Deputy Magistrate and Deputy Collector of Dacca.

The report of the Commissioners, Mr. C. W. Bolton and Bahu

Peary Mohan Banerjee, dated 8th June 1895, together with record of evidence and miscellaneous papers submitted by them.

The Lieutenant-Governor has carefully considered the Report of the Commission which was appointed for the purpose of deciding on Mr. Fordyce's fitness for retention in the public services. The Procedure followed by the Commission, with the approval of Government, was first to enquire into specific charges of taking illegal gratifications, next to record evidence of general report in Daeca regarding Mr. Fordyce's conduct, and finally to examine generally his judicial work at Dacca.

2. Six cases of alleged corruption have been thoroughly enquired into: the evidence on both sides has seen fully taken down and a careful judicial finding has been recorded in each case by the Com-The Lieutenant-Governor agrees that it was unnecessary to extend the enquiry to a larger number of cases. A single instance of corruption fully proved—such as the second case in which Thakur Das Banikya was concerned, a case of flagrant injustice, tyranny and extortion---would have been sufficient to establish Mr. Fordyce's unfitness for the public service. The Commission have found that in all six cases the charge of corruption is distinctly proved. It is unnecessary to recite the facts which are set forth in detail in the report, but it is observed that in two cases money was taken from both the complainant and the accused, and in one case from a second batch of accused subsequently summoned : she six cases therefore resolve themselves into nine specific charges. Sir Charles Elliot has carefully examined the evidence and considervariety of sentiments with which poets have looked upon the dis- ed the judicial comments of the Commission thereon, and does not entertain the slightest doubt that on all the counts on which enquiry was made, Mr. Fordyce has been justly tound guilty of bribery and corruption.

3. It is alleged by Mr. Fordyce that the pleaders and mukh-tears of Dacca have conspired to get up these charges against him. But this allegation is rejected by the Commission as absolutely unfounded. No evidence of the existence of a vindictive motive for the action taken by the members of the Bar was adduced before the Commission. It is shown that many months before the pleaders and mukhtears submitted their memorial to Government, public attention had been drawn by the local press to the rumours circulating regarding Mr. Fordyce, and there is evidence that such rumours were current a few months after he joined at Ducca. Pleaders and mukhtears also deposed before the Commission that specific acts of corruption were brought to their notice from time to time by their clients. The Commission have placed in record in submitting their memorial to Government, that the pleaders were actuated their memorial to Government, that the present of the grave scandal which they believed existed. They also declare that the principal witnesses before them gave their evidence naturally and trathfully, and that the cases appeared to have been laid before them in a thoroughly honest manner.

4. The evidence as to general report is based upon the state-ments of many of the chief residents of Dacca, including Nawab Khwaja Alisanullah Bahadur, C. I. E, and several members of the District and municipal Boards, Honorary Magistrates and Zemindars one and all speak to the fact that a wide-pread rumour prevailed in Dacca that Mr. Fordyce took money from parties appearing before him, and few mentioned instances in which they were actually told of the payment of money by the persons from whom it was taken. The Commission remark: "There is thus no question whatsoever that Mr. Fordyce was generally believed in Dacca to be corrupt, and to be so, not rarely and occasionally, but constantly and systematically." The Lieutenant-Governor agrees that it is in the highest degree improbable that such a belief should have been without any foundation, and considers that its existence raises a stong presumption of the truth of the specific charges of corruption.

The Commission have furnished, in the appendix to their report, particulars of 17 judicial records which were examined by them, with their remarks thereon, and Mr. Fordyce's explanations. In addition, they examined less minutely the record of all cases disposed of by Mr. Fordyce during his service in Dacca. They point our many irregularities and defects in procedure, and sum up this portion of their report by observing:—"On the whole we think that there is much in the records of Mr. Fordyce's cases generally, which tends to support the conclusion that he was systematically corrupt

The Commission conclude their report with the following words :-- "Having completed all sections of our report, we have now, in conclusion, to state our finding on the specific question referred to us, that is, whether Mi. Fordyce is or is not a fit person to be retained in Government service. After the opinions which we have expressed in reviewing the evidence on the specific charges of corruption preferred against Mr. Fordyce, our answer to that question is obvious. We are clearly of opinion that Mr. Fordyce is entirely unfit to be retained in public service. He has been proved to our satisfaction to have, with the assistance of his servant Rajab Ali, carried on a systematic conise of extorting money by intimidation from parties concerned in criminal cases heard by him, and his further employment by the Government is impossible. We believe him to be possessed of fair ability, but we have also no doubt of his thorough want of principle. In view of the very serious nature of the conduct of which we have found him guilty, the question whether he should be criminally prosecuted may again suggest itself. Our opinion on this question has not been desired, but we venture to remark that the Government was, in our opinion well advised not to institute a criminal prosecution, and that it will be wise to adhere to that decision. The direct evidence remains that of accomplices, or persons who may be held to be such, and there is not much corroborated evidence which would be admissible in a judicial trial.
7. The Lientenant-Governor has no hesitation in respect of the orders to be passed on this report. Such men as Mr. Fordyce are a conker in the Executive Branch of the Provincial service, and it is impossible to inflict any other punishment than dismissal. Lieutenant-Governor concurs with the verdict of the Commission that Mr. Fordyce is entirely unfit to be retained in the public service, and directs that he be dismissed from the employ of Government with effect from the date when he was placed under suspension.

His Honour desires, in conclusion, to acknowledge the careful, exhaustive and thoroughly impartial manner in which the Commission have conducted their enquiry, and thanks the members, Mr. Bolton and Babu Peary Mohan Banerjee, for their complete

SEVEN POUNDS IN ONE WEEK.

SEVEN FOUNDS IN UNE WEEK.

NOT every many who is thus would thank you for fattening him. He doesn't want to be fat and for very good reasons. Unnecessary fat is a load to carry about; it interferes with a man's power to work, shortens his wind, and dulls his wite.

Yet, on the other hand, a certain amount of flesh is needed for health and comfou. For example; A man five feet high should weight about 120lbs; and man five feet is x inches, 145lbs. It is a regular ascending scale. The insurance companies allow a variation of 7 per cent, above or below it, and beyond those limits charge an extra premium. One shouldn't be much over in under his proper weight if he wants to be sound and hearty—and we all do want that.

his proper weight if he wants to be sound and hearty—and we all do want that.

Now we will tell you how Mr. Thomas Crosby, being under weight, gained seven pounds in a week. He had lost 1½ stone, which is non-nuch off for a man who was never fesshier than he naturally ought to be. It was this way. He was right enough up to May, 1891. At that time he began to feel if and out of sourts. He had a masty taste in his month—like routen eggs, he says—and a thick, stimy stuff came on his guins and teeth. His appetite failed, and what he did eat was, as you might say, under compulsion; and right afterwards he would have great pain in his stomach and cliest. Plandy, something was amiss with him in that region. He was often dizzy, and cold childs ran over him as though he were threatened with fever. Of cause we should expect a man who is handled in this way to love strength. Mr. Cosby lost strength. In fact, he got so wenk and nervous that he shook all over, and his hands trembled as if a current of electricity were running through him.

lost strength. In fact, he got so weak and nervous that he shook all over, and his hands trembled as if a current of electricity were running through him.

To use his own words: "I rapidly lost flesh, was 1½ stone lighter, and could hardly walk about. Once my patents throught I was dying, and sent in haste for the doctor. I saw two doctors in Epworth and one at Haxey, but they were not able to help me. Our year, Rev. Mr. Overton, recommended me to the Lincoln Infirmary, where I attended for eight weeks as an outdour patient, without benefit.

"Soon afterwards Mr. Su.rp, a chemist, at Epworth, spoke to me of the virtues of a medicine known as Another Seigel's Curaire Syrop. Being interested in what he said, I left off trying other things and negan taking this Syrup. In a few days I felt better, and presently I gained seven pounds in a week. At that rate I soon got back to my work, and have had the best of health ever since. I tell three facts to everybody, and camperfectly willing they should be published. Yours truly (Signed), Tom CROSN, Ferry Road, Epworth, via Donicaster, December 23rd, 1852."

After reading Mr. Crosby's story we scarcely need to ask why he lost flesh. The immute he stopped eating and digesting his usual allowance of food he began to fall away. Trees, they say, grow as much from the air by means of their leaves, as they do from the soil, But men don't. They've got to be built up through their stomachs. Indigestion and dyspepora (Mr. Crosby's compainit) stops this process and poisous those who have it, besides. That accounts for all the painful and dangerous symptoms our friend speaks of. The doctors do what they can, bin, unluckily, they don't possess the medicine that gos to the bottom of this disease and cures it. The remedy is Mother Sengel's Curaive Syrup, and hothing else, so far as we know, It restores digestion, and digestion covers the boues with far enough for health and good looks.

TO SWALLOWS ON THE EVE OF DEPARTURE.
BY B. SIMMONS.

"The day before V——'s departure for the last time from the country—it was the 4th of August, one of the hottest days of the season—as evening fell, he strolled with an old school-fellow through the cool green avenues and leafy arcades of the neighbouring park, where his friend amused him by pointing out to his attention vastice on the roofs and gables of the manor-house. This they do for several days preparatory to their departing, in one collected body, to more genial chimates." – MS. Memoir.

In the clear evening light
To leave our dwindled suinmer dFyFor latitudes more bright!
How gay must be your greeting,

How gay must be your greeting, By southern fountains meeting,

To mess no faithful wing of all that started in your flight !

Every clime and season
Fresh gladness brings to you.
Howe'er remote your social throngs
Their varied path pursue;
No winds nor waves dissever—
No dusky veil'd FOREVER,

Frowneth across your fearless way in the empyrean blue, *

Were ye in Arctic hours,

Mottling the evening beam that sloped
Adown old Gothic towers!

As blythe that sunlight dancing
Will see your pinions' glancing

Scattering afar through Tropic groves the spicy bloom in showers !

Haunters of palaced wastes ! †
From king-fortorn Versattles

s "They all quit together, and fly for a time east or west, possibly in wait for stragglers not yet arrived from the interior—they then take directly to the south, and are soon lost sight of altogether for the altotted period of their absence. Their rapidity of flight is well known, and the 'murder-aiming eye' of the most experienced sportsman weldom avail against the swallow; hence they themselves seldom fall a prey to the raptorial birds."—Covier, edited by Griffiths. Swallows are long-lived; they have been known to live a number of years in cages.

'f In the fanciful language of Chateaubriand, "This daughter of a king (the swallow) still seems attached to grandeur; she passes the summer amid the ruins of Versailles, and the winter among those of Tasbes."

To where, round gateless Thebes, the winds
Like monarch voices wail,
Your tibe capricious ranges,
Reckless of glory's changes,
Love makes for ye a merry home amid the ruins pale.

Another day, and ye
From knosp and turret's brow
Shall, with your fleet of crowding wings,
An's viewless billows plough,
With no keen-fang'd regretting
Our darken'd hill-sides quitting, —Away in fond companionship as cheerily as now!

VI.

Woe for the sonl-endued—

'The clay-enthralled mind—

Leaving, unlike you, favor'd birds t

Its all—its all behind,

Woe for the exile mourning,

To banishment returning—

A mateless bud wide torn apart from country and from kind!

VII.

This moment blest as ye,

Beneath his wan home-trees,

With friends and fellows girt around,

Up springs the western breeze,

Bringing the parting weather—

Shall all depart together?

Ah, no !—he goes a wretch alone upon the lonely seas

To him the mouldering tower—
The pillar'd waste, to him
A broken-hearted music make
Until his eyelids swim.
None heeds when he complaineth,
Nor where that brow he leaneth

VIII

Nor where that brow he leaneth A mother's lips shall bless no more sinking to slumber dim.

Winter shall wake to spring,
And 'inid the fragrant grass
The daffodit shall watch the rill
Like Beauty by her glass.
But woe for him who pineth
Where the clear water shineth,

With no voice near to say-How sweet those April evenings pass !

Love freshly burns again,
Hither shall ye, plumed travellers,
Come trooping o'er the main;
The self-same nook disclosing
Its nest for your reposing
That saw you revel years ago as you shall revel then.

A few short years are gone—
Back, back like you to early scenes—
Lot at the threshold-stone,
Where ever in the gloaming
Home's angels watch't bis coming,
A stranger stands, and stares at him who sighing passes on.

THE Parthenon is to be repaired if not restored. The Archæological Society at Athens has decided to prevent the temple from further running into ruin. The repairs are to be on the lines guggested by the eminent German Professor Durm. He and the English and the French archæologists, Mr. F. C. Penrose, who has a work on Athenian Architecture, and M. Magne have been requested to give their views and advice on the details of the proposed repairs. We hope they will be better than those to the Taj at Agra.

JUNE 24, the anniversary of the murder of President Carnot, was solemnly observed at Paus. President Faure went in state to the Painthéon and laid a wreath upon the tomb. He was followed by an enormous number of persons who also deposited a very large number of wreaths. The ruling President also attended a service at the Madeleine held in memory of the murdered President.

A RAILWAY from Russia into Peisia, passing through Baku, Resht and Tabriz, is under consideration.

ON June 26, at the Imperial Institute, the Prince of Wales opened the hfth International Railway Congress. There were present delegates from various parts of the world. The Prince welcomed them on behalf of the Queen, himself and the great railway companies of England. Among other things, he said.

"Nearly seventy years ago the first railway that was constructed in the world, that between Stockton and Dailington, was opened. Five years later, in 1830, mater circumstances of the most tragic kind, the first railway constructed under parlamentary powers and by money publicly subscribed was manginated for passenger traffic between Manchester and Liverpool, and a ceremony of great interest and greater promise wis marted by the lamentable accident which led to the death of Mr. Huskisson. In the sixty years which have since

elapsed, the development of railways has progressed throughout the world, and we have fitly met here to-day to show our interest in that celebrated undustry which, probably more than any other, has enhanced the wealth and tostered the commerce of the world, and has tended to promote international friendship and universal goodwill (Cheers.) The Railway Congress had its origin in 1885, when a number of leading railway men met at Biussels to celebrate the Jubilee of the Belgian railways. Congresses have been since held in Milan in 1887, and in Paris in 1892; and the last Congress, which assembled in St. Petersbing in 1892, was made meniorable by the splendid hospitality and great encouragement given to it by the late Lamented Emperor of Russia. (Heart.) I fear that we cannot promise you the beauty of Italy, the gaiety of Paris, or the magnificent reception which was accorded to you on the last occasion on which you met; but we can show you Manchester, Liverpool, Cradiff, and Crewe, great centres of industry, from which I hope you will be able to derive useful knowledge, and in which you will be able also to see example, of the most beneficial work. I venture to say this even to our friends from the United States (a country which owns nearly half the railway mileage of the would), as well as to the tepresentatives of India and our colonies, who have helped forward the work of railway development with a speed and a success which I think deserve the utmost commendation. The programme of discussion, interesting as it is in those who, like yourselves, know how to appreciate technical details, will be of interest likewise to the public. You will be asked to consider not only the acceleration of passenger trains, but the means for promoting the confort of passengers by the use of ventibule or contidor cars, and of improved methods of heating and lighting. You will be also asked to consider arrangements for adding to the safety of the travelling public. It is not not a question which is of growing interest in this country

BEFORE the dissolution, a Bill to reform the inebriate, called the Inebriates Bill, was, on the 21st June, in the House of Commons, read a second time. It is intended to detain in reformationes habitual drunkards who commit or not any breach of the criminal law. The County Court, subject to appeal to the High Court, and the High Court without a jury are proposed to be empiaseed to order detention up to two years of a person proved to be inebitate and administration of his affairs by another person. Lord Halsbury characterized the proposal regarding non-criminal drunkards as a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Lord Salvsbury opposed the provision saying that it opened the door to false accusation and to blackmailing, and withdrew from a person who was not even charged with a crime the protection of a jury. The Lord Chancellor expressed his willingness to meet as fair as possible the objections raised.

General Low has just been officially informed that Her Majesty's Government require time to decide on the details of the permanent settlement of that country, and that, as the present season is unfavourable for the movement of large bodies of troops, the force occupying Chural and Dir road cannot be withdrawn before September at all events. The prospect is dismal for the Indian Treasury.

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deaf. ness, Singing in Ears, &c , on inatter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free. -Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VICTORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

StR Stenart Bayley had abandoned the rule of these Provinces to be the Political and Secret Secretary in the India Office. He was wiser than those who had condemned him for the descent. His choice has been rewarded and he is now a member of the Council of the Secretary of State for India. He is to be succeeded as Secretary by Mr. Lee-Warner. That Political, it is said, will not complete his twentyone years of actual service qualifying for pension until September 16. The rule must, therefore, he relaxed in his favour or the appointment kept open for him. But why should the India Office be a preserve for pensioners? The Riyal Commission on India might well direct its attention to that quarter,

A PARLIAMENTARY return gives the circumstances under which certain English Civil servants have not been forced to retire on attaining the prescribed limit of sixty-five years,

"Under the Treasmy Munite of April 1892 it is set forth that there are three man grounds upon which the returement of an officer at sixty-five might be detrumental to the interests of the public server, these being as follows:—(1) When the number of officers in a departthese being as follows:—(1) When the number of officers in a department above the prescribed age is such that their simultaneous removal wanid cance grave inconvenience; (2) when an officer possesses peculiar qualifications which are essential to the performance of the duties of his office, and which it would be difficult to replace by a fiesh appointment; (3) where an officer has been entired with the execution of a princular duty which is approaching completion, and it is found that the transfer of the work to another officer who is necessarily less familiar with it would be attended with inconvenience. The return gives under Class II. (Class I. heing iil), the names of eight officers who were relatived mere the age of saxisfiers in the year 1800 for who were retained over the age of sixty-five in the year 1894 95. Under Class III seven names are given."

Would the British Museum and the India Office were as considerate! They would then still have Dr. Rien and Dr. Rost. Both were truly irreplaceable. There is not another Arabic and Persian scholar living in Eugland equal to Di. Rieu. He has, however, been provided for The Combridge University aftered its statutes to employ him. If Di Rust's successur were half as clever or accomplished as her there might be some reason for enforcement of the Treasury minute. Dr. Rust has, since his retirement, been utilized as a literary back only to be cast away sick and heart-broken.

MAHARAJA Natendra Krishna, Raja Rajendra Narayan Deb, Sir Romesh Chander Mitter and Babus Nobin Chand Dutt, of the Hatkhola Dutt Family, Pashupati Nath Bose, Municipal Commissioner, Guruprassanno and Romanath Ghose, of the Ghoses of Pathuriaghatta and Jorabagan, have called a meeting of the Kyastha community of Calcutta and its suburbs to consider the growing custom of demanding high dowers from the parents of brides. The meeting takes place at four in the afternoon of Sunday next, at 47, Pathuroaghatta Street, the residence of the late Baboo Khelachchander Ghose, Government had been applied to to find a remedy for the evil. So Charles Elliott, however, thinks that the reform should proceed from the community uself. The present movement is commendable and we hope will bear fruit.

IN 1874, the Panjah Chief Court in Full Bench had decided that a barrister was debarred from sung for his fees. It still anheres to that opinion, Mr. Atthin Grey saed Dewin Luchman Das, late Prime Minister of Kashima, for Rs 2,39t 14. The sum is the balance of a claim for service done as attorney to the Dewan's mother. There are not attorneys at Lihore and counsel, like pleaders, take their instructions from clients direct. The sait was opposed, among others, on the ground on which it has been thrown out. Two Courts having held the claim unmaintainable, there was an appeal to the Chief Court. The Judges were divided Justices Frizelle, Stogdon and Chatterjee stack to the traditions of the bar and held that the plaintiff as a binister-at-law was incapacitated from making a contract of hiring. Justices Roe and Rivaz were of a different mund. The latter says -

"An advocate's fees to the Punjth, when all fegal fictions have been brushed away, are distinctly merces and not honoraria. The leading advacates of the Pumph Bar can influential and honourable body) advacates of the Filiph Bar (an infliential and honourable body) must largal for their tenunciation directly with their clients, and by a universal custom, which is not considered improfessional in this Province, must even be content to allow a certain portion of their fees to depend upon the result of the linguism. In this respect, and in to depend upon the result of the regularity of the respect, and in most others, the advocate is on excity the same hosting as the pleader. An advocate in this Province has the right of pre-andience over a preader of older standing, and earn makes his attengement direct with his client. Each conducts his clients cases in Court with the same powers and privileges,"

A barrister is a barrister always. He may sink himself into an attorney, yet he does not cease to be a barrister. He may charge anything for his services, but he must not complain of non-payment. Each to his own, seems to be the verdict of the majority of the Punjab Judges. To the many privileges of a bairister, they will not add a right enjoyable by a pleader.

WE read:—
"It is not often that fundness for a pet creature leads its possessor to such extrest efforts to save its life, as than which was recently adapted in an educational establishment in Bombay. A cygnet belonging to a lady in the Fort accidentally swillowed some poison pot down for vermin, and was discovered in a state of collapse. The owner at once sent for a European doctor, asking him to bring an anyoning and chlorofism. Meanwhile, in order to save time, the distressed lady sent to a chemist's ship close by, for an emetic, which was duly administered, but without avail, and when the doctor arrived he found he was too late to save his singular patient. This is not allebels to save his singular patient. This is not allectionary, and in the presence of a number of young people, in the compound of an ecclesiastical building."

Is the incident so unnatural? A bird in confinement, affording delight.

Is the orcident so unnatural? A bird in confinement, affording delight to its owner, is as much an object of sympathetic treatment and kind consideration as any human impate of a household. Lower animated Nature not unoften affords examples to the lord of creation. Leaving uside the extravagance of costry marriages of dogs and dankeys, affection for animals and birds is worthy of ad praise. If human nature were always as kind, man would never be the brute that he sometimes proves. We can well imagine that it was no vanity but a true humanity that was so auxious for the caged bird and that gave it an affectionate burial,

On Wednesday Mr. Ananda Mohan Bose, Barrister-at Law, was gazetted a member of the Lieutenant-Governor's Legislative Council, On the previous Saturday Mr. Bose had taken his seat

There is a hitch as to the appaintment of Babon Ishan Chunder Mitter. No objection was taken by the defeated candidate for election for the Buidwan Division. Government seems not disposed to accept the recommendation without scritting.

The Dacca Division has been permitted to hold a second election.

Brig ade-Surgeon John Martin Coates, M.D., late Bengal Medical Department, is dead. He was carried away by cholera which is traced to milk in the neighbourhood of the New Market. He was given no military burial, for he had wished, unsophisticated as he was, a plant interment. His first commission was dated as early as 1855. In December of the next year he received medical charge of the 1st Bengal military police battalion. Three years after, in April, 1859, we find hun Civil Assistant Surgeon. Next, successively, he was Superintendent of Jails, Hazanibagh, Civil Surgeon, Murshidabad, in joint medical charge, Simla, and in charge of Commander-in-Chief's staff, Samtary Commissioner for Bengal, Principal and Professor of Medicine, Medic al College, Calcutta, and ex-officio 1st Physician to the Cullege Hospital, Inspector-General of Jans, Surgeon-General, Bengal. On his retriement from service in July 1890, he did not leave India, but continued here chiefly as Physician to Maharaja Sn Luchmeswar Sing of Durbhanga. He had a juvial spirit and kindly disposition which endeared him to his pupils and patients. He was more a friend than a physician. No grave M. D., but Nature's graduate, he

Than all the timmpery in the druggist's pile.

At a time when the Faculty fell out with Government on the question of hospital reform, that is, reduction of expenditure on hispitals, when Dr. Chevers stoutly opposed any innovation, when Dr. Sunth left the Principalship of the Medical College not to be a party to the policy of Dr. Payne, and no body would accept the office, Dr. Coates came forward and rescued Government from a persions situation. Charged with carrying out a policy of stern economy, he found it his duty to recommend payment of fees by students of the Medical College who, after completing their temps, had failed to pass the final examination. He was, unlike himself, severe in his remarks on the petition of the students for exemption.

At the same time, he felt strongly for the Assistant Surgeons who were dismissed the service for refusing to submit to a second examination ordered by Dr. Hilson, on suspicion of fonl play at the first He had himself superintended the examination and knew the suspicion had no foundation and was thus enabled to fight hard for them. THE annual meeting of the Indian Association for the Cultivation But to no purpose. He was, as we have seen, differently formed from Dis. Chevers and Smith, his predecessors in the Medical College, or from Di. Ewart, and, while feeling the injustice to the Assistant Surgeous and to himself, bore the slight in silence.

THE Superinten ding Engineer to the Nizam's Dominions-Babu Madhusudan Chatterjee, C. E, has been retried on good service pension. Passed out of the Rootkee College, he was a District Engineer under the British Government when his services, at the request of Sir Salar Jung I., were transferred to Hyderabad, where he commenced as Principal of the Hyderabad Civil Engineering College on a salary of Rs. 700. On the abolition of the College, he was appointed Superintending Engineer of the P. W. D., on Rs. 1,000 a month. The pay was subsequently taised to Rs. 1200. His services at Hyderabad extend over 23 years, short by some months to entitle him to half pension. Mr. Chatterjee is of a quiet, unobtruding nature. Mindful of his own duties, he advoided Hyderabad politics. If he thus kept himself clear of troubled waters, he must not complain of his devotion to work not having been adequately rewarded. It is something, though, that his son, Babu Kali Cours, has occuprovided with an appointment

AFTER half a century of service, the Permanent Assistant Private Secretary to the Viceroy, Mr. D. Pantoty, has been removed by death. He was never sick or sorry, and had kept his health remarkably well The death was sudden. He sickened and died at Simla while bathing, Although no East Indian Worthy, the Eurasian community night well be proud of him. The success of his life was visible even in death. At the funeral, the Viceroy, the Lieutenant-Governor and the Commander-in-Chief were represented. Mr. Pamory joined the office of the Private Secretary on a small pay when Lord Dalhousie was Governor-General. Previously he was in the Bengal Office where he had his training. Like most members of his community in the upper clerical service of Government, he had no education to speak of. He made up as he went ou, till he could keep a promiscuons company engaged by his conversation. He was in charge of the most important and responsible office in India for many years. During this long period he managed it wonderfully well. Never did a secret goze out, although it was full of secrets of a very important nature regarding finance, war, deposition of princes and reform of administration. His office was always above suspicion and never shared the obloquy of any of the offices of the Government of India or of the local Secretariat. There were no placards of "No admittance ' or "Warning to Government clerks" in his office rooms, yet nut a scrap of information ever got out regarding the deposition of Mulhar Rao, the deportation of Thebaw, the imposition of income tax, or the application of jury trial.

Mr. Pamoty had his weaknesses. He was foul of flattery and had his favourites. Merit to him was a secondary consideration He would rule his subordurates with an non hand, taking all their sins upon himself. If he prote cied them from the wiath of his superiors, he was unmindful of their wants and sufferings of his own creation. The 55 years' rule was never meant for him. But one of his ablest assistants was retired, on inadequate pension, before his time, and another highly competent man under him had sent up his papers in disgust.

But for his caste, the late Assistant Private Secretary, who had the Confidence and high opinion of two Governors-General and ten Viceroys and their Private Secretaries, he would have earned higher disgenerious than a C. I. E. which also came late. It was not till the Viceroyalty of Lord Ripon that he was thought worthy of that honour. The distriction that he had valued higher was the privilege of being admitted to State Dinners. He was, therefore, more thankful to Colonel Ardagh than to Mr. Primrose. Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace was exceptionally kind to him. He made a very favourable bargain for him in the matter of the location of the Private Secretary's

Mr. F. W. Latimer is carrying on the duties of the Assistant Private Secretary, and it is hoped he will be permanently appointed. He was brought out by Lord Mayo and has been improving ever since. He has gamed experience and, besides knowledge of the working of the office, has sympathy with the subordinates.

MARRIAGE DOWER IN BENGAL.

In almost every civilised country, marital unions are the result of girls and their kinsmen being solicited by youths and their relatives and friends. Young men, when they reach a certain age and become desirous of settling in domesticity, look for a wife among the girls of their acquaintance. Kinsmen and relatives interfere, and the terms, which in most cases are few and simple, being settled, the parties are united as man and wife. In India, however, from remote antiquity, marriages have been effected in a different way. Here it is the kinsmen of the girl that have been burthened with the duty of finding a proper mate for her. Women are not made woo, they should be wooed and won-has no application in India. In four out of the eight forms of marriage mentioned by the early sages, the girl's guardians are wooers. By far the majority of unions are based on those forms. Three out of the remaining four, viz., Gándharva, Rákshasa, and Paisácha, have long since been obsolete, the last two in special having become even criminal under the penal code current in the country, for nobody can now wed with impunity a girl abducted from the custody of her guardians or obtaining her consent by fraud. The other form, viz., Asura, in which the girl is purchased for price from her parents or kinsmen, deserves to be put down. This form of marriage has always been current among the lower orders. The Hindu lawgivers directed their censures against it, but they failed to suppress it. So long as girls have a marketable value, their kinsmen exact it without at all caring for the religious injunctions to the contrary.

The custom of exacting high dowers from the girl's he can thus acquire is nothing to what he can side is confined to the higher classes of society. Speaking of Bengal, it prevails among only Kulin Brahmans and high-born or well-to-do Kayasthas in general. The origin of the practice is not difficult to explain. The daughter, according to the ancient Hindu idea, is looked upon as a chattel. The obligation of marrying her to an eligible bridegroom was cast upon the father by the early sages. Failure to marry her properly was declared to be a sin demanding expiation. The Aryan settlers in India were at first few. Vast tracts of country, with a soil highly fertile, were in the hands of the aboriginal inhabitants. How to multiply, how to increase their number, was with them a question of the greatest importance. Polygamy was sanctioned at a very early age. The Brahmans were allowed to take wives from all the four orders, though in later times the acceptance of Sudra wives was looked upon with disfavour. The Kshatriyas could accept wives from the two orders below them besides their own. The Vaisyas, besides marrying in their own order, were free to choose Sudra wives. The Sudras were limited to their own order. The evidence is not clear of the early sages having sanctioned the remarriage of widows. Neither the Mahabharata nor the Ramayana throws any light on the question. If the re-marriage of widows was ever prevalent in India in ancient times, it must have been among the lower orders. So far as the higher orders were concerned, they were unaffected by it. For all that, the custom of raising offspring by vicarious means, was certainly in vogue even among the three higher orders. The husband's younger brothers often acted as substitutes if the husband happened to be absent, or if he died without children. The object the Rishis had in view was certainly the increase of population. Men bent upon multiplying their number were naturally disposed to make marriage an obligatory act. Of the four modes of life, viz., pupilage, domesticity, residence in the forest, and complete renunciation, domesticity or the status of a householder was applauded very highly. All the other modes were dependant on it. Every youth, completing his study, was directed to marry and become a householder. He was not to become a forest recluse until he had begotten children. He that dies without having begotten a child goes to an unmentionable place reserved for the childless. His debt to his progenitors remains unpaid. The latter fall down from their high status in consequence of such neglect or omission on the part of their descendant. Besides being a purlficatory act for members of the male sex, marriage was declared to be doubly obligatory for the female sex. Women have no vows to observe, no religious rites to perform, except as wives and in the company of their husbands. The Rishis pronounced fasts as highly meritorious. Unto women having husbands, fasts were, however, not allowed.

Jivadbhartarı ya nari uposya vratamacharet, A'yuh samharate bhartuh sh nari narakam vrajet, was the declaration of Atri and, after him, of almost every sage regarded as an authority. The sense is that the woman who, having a husband, observes a vow with fasts, lessens the life of her husband and, departing this life, is plunged into misery. The Hindu idea of marriage is the union of two persons into one for the acquisition of religious merit. A male person, by himself, may acquire merit, but the merit that solicitous of preserving the purity of their own clans earn along with his wife. For a person of the female sex, the only way open for the acquisition of merit is marriage, for she can do nothing when dissociated from her husband. The obligation of marrying is one from which the very denizens of heaven could not be free. The gods could not exist without their goddesses. Among a people by whom the institution of marriage was viewed in such a light, the disposal of daughters in marriage naturally came to be regarded as an unavoidable duty. It is true that marriage being an obligatory act, men were as much bound to look for wives as women for husbands, but in a country where plurality of wives was not only allowed but was the general rule, parents would naturally be more concerned with comfortably settling their daughters than their male children. The practice of early marriage also, which necessitated the interference of parents and kinsmen, had much to do with the greater solicitude manifested by the kinsmen of marriageable daughters. The kinsmen of male children, even when the latter attain to a marriageable age, lose nothing by postponing the union. Not so the kinsmen of girls. These, if the scriptures are to be followed, must be married before they attain to a certain state. The rule is a very old one. They who were responsible for laying it down must have been impelled by the desire of multiplying the population. Other circumstances came in to give force to the scriptural injunction. The complete affiliation of the girl in the family of her husband was looked upon as one of the ends of marriage. This affiliation, it was felt, would be easy if the girl married were of tender years. A grown up girl, with her habits formed, cannot be easily broken into the ways of her new home. The joint family is another ancient institution of India which has exercised a potent influence in this direction. Desirous probably of preventing ante-nuptial scandal of any kind, heads of large families numbering cousins and collateral descendants by the dozen, would naturally like to dispose of the daughters as Apart from these reasons founded on considera-tions connected with both the Hindu scriptures and the peculiar circumstances of Aryan society, so far as Bengal is concerned, the institution of Kulinism, founded by Ballal Sen, has much to do with the greater solicitude manifested, in the matter of marriage, by the kinsmen of girls than those of male children. Adisur, believed to have been the founder of the Sen dynasty of kings, noticed the degeneracy of the Brahmans of his kingdom. He was obliged to import a number of pure and learned Brahmans from the North-West. These soon multiplied under the fostering care of that monarch and his descendants. One of the latter, Ballal Sen, wishing to prevent their degeneracy, classed them as Kulins and Srotriyas. It was a purely sacerdotal and not a social aristocracy that Ballal sought to create. Vedic learning was the qualification that entitled one to become a Kulin. In course of time, however, the institution of Kulinism degenerated. That which was intended to be a sacerdotal aristocracy-an aristocracy of learning and good conduct—became a social aristocracy—an aristocracy of birth and blood. The maintenance of its purity came to be associated with marriage, for birth and blood are directly dependant on it. Parents of girls became

by marrying their daughters into proper families. No wonder that eligible youths soon became rare commodities. For all that, large prices were seldom demanded for the acceptance of daughters. Only polygamy became the natural result of degenerated Kulinism. The present custom of demanding large dowers for daughters is of very recent origin. Although prevailing only among Kulin Brahmans and higher class Kayasthas, and some other castes, notably the Subarnavaniks, it has nothing to do in reality with the institution of Kulinism. The practice is of very recent origin. Only fifty years back, a Srotriya Brahman could bestow his daughter on a Kulin youth without undergoing any expense. A Kulin father also could marry his daughter without much ado. Then, again, the girl's guardians had no objection to the youth of their choice taking more than one wife. Nor were they solicitous of the girl being taken away from the parental home after marriage. It was only when the difference was very great between the social status of the two families that the bidegroom's family could demand a fair compensation. The Savarna Chowdhuries of Barisha, the Gossains of Khurdaha, and a few other families among the Rarhiya section of the Bengal Brahmans, and the Kafs among the Barendras, were obliged to give large dowers for the luxury of marrying their daughters to Kulin youths. We say luxury, for it was by no means obligatory with any of them to contract marriage alliances with Kulin families.

The origin of the custom of payment of heavy dowers, recent as it undoubtedly is, should be sought for in other directions. Formerly, parents of girls, however solicitous of marrying them, never looked for so many accomplishments in the youths of their choice as now. They were content with only birth and blood. Every family had a few paternal acres upon which to live. The love of luxury was not general. The wants of men were few and a little could satisfy these. In course of the last half century society has changed and is changing. Love of luxury has become general. Wants have multiplied. Money is needed to meet them. A variety of accomplishments is expected in a bridegroom. Over birth and blood he must have property or the means of good living. Themselves living in good houses, the guardians of girls are unwilling to send them to thatched or tiled cottages. They are, again, naturally unwilling to secure them the position of only a co-wife. They wish their daughters to be taken away from their houses into the families of their husbands. If poor, the youths must have at least a fair education, which, it is believed, will enable them to earn the means of comfortable sustenance. An eligible youth,-eligible according to the present eligible youtn,—engine according to the present standard,—is sought simultaneously by more than one person. There is keen competition in the matrimonial market. There has also been an excess of girls over boys. All this has naturally raised the price of marriageable youths. Brahmans and Kyasthas who constitute the higher classes of Bengal society are, again, imitated by the other castes.

We, therefore, despair of a remedy for the disease. Public meetings and resolutions condemning the practice, would be of little avail. Our habits have become expensive in every direction.
The clothes that clad our fathers, the houses The clothes that clad our fathers, the houses and was prepared for it. A number of Sunnis had that sheltered them, the food and drink that nourished them, can no longer content us. So many ornaments of gold and silver have come into fashion that our grandmothers, if they came back to life, would contemplate them with gaping eyes. We have outlived that stage of our national life when wants were few and could be gratified with little labour. The marriage expenses have necessarily increased. The revolution in tastes is responsible for the evil.

Yet a reform is wanted, for we must marry our daughters. Unless we can devise a method, there is every prospect of Shastric injunctions being over-ridden. Then, again, a danger of alarming magnitude threatens us in another direction. Already, in certain families, the death of an unmarried daughter is not looked upon as a calamity. Parents may feel the loss keenly. Still society looks upon it as rather a relief to the father.

THE MAHARRAM.

THE display of sorrow on the anniversary of the death of the grandsons of Mahomed is over, but it was not entirely unattended with disturbance. The first friction occurred at Bhagalpur, where they had long been preparing for it. On the 14th of April an alam was taken out in procession by Syed Irtaza Hossein, a Zemindar. It had been prohibited in previous years, but the prohibition has been removed. The closing reign in Bengal is disposed to relax its stern discipline as regards Bhagalpur. Thus:

From---H. J. S. Cotton, Esq., C. S. I., Chief Secry. to the Govt of Bengal,

To---The Commissioner of the Bhagalpur Division. Calcutta, the 27th March, 1895.

Sir,---I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter

Sir, --- I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 364J dated 26th January 1895, reporting on the prayer of the Shia Mahomedans of Bhagalpur to be allowed to carry out the Alam with tir, mussuk and tulwar during the Moharram celebration.

2. In reply I am to observe that the facts of the case at Bhagalpur are not altogether analogous to those of Gya and Chupra in which the decision of Government, prohibiting the procession, was based on the principle of declining to allow any innovation in the existing practice. In Bhagalpur, it appears that the memorialists, Syuds Irtaza Hossein and Murtaza Hossein, have the memorialists, Syuds Irtaza 110ssein and Muriataa It-ssein, have actually been in the habit for many years of taking out the procession with the Shia symbols, but in such a way as not to attract attention or give offence and that, if this practice had been adhered to nothing probably would have been heard of the matter. The question seems to have been stirred up in 1802 by one Mirza Mahomed Saved, of the Outh family, who 1892 by one Mirza Mahomed Saved, of the Oudh family, who had intermarried with the Shias of Bhagalpur and who made attempts to conduct the procession for the first time with pomp and ceremony through the heart of the town. In consequence, objection was taken by the Sunnis and the Magistrate, Mr. Coxe, prohibited the procession. The proposed procession, which was a pure innovation, appears to have been the cause of all the present trouble to the memorialists. The Lieutenant-Governor considers, that in the circumstance, it was rightly prohibited, but that there can be no objection to the memorialists following their collections and conducting their procession in a quiet manner as that there can be no objection to the memorialists following their old custom and conducting their procession in a quiet manner as they are said to have done in former times from Iraza Hossien's house to the Shahjingt tank, provided they undertake to abstain from the utterance of "tabarra." This route is believed to be thinly peopled and no breach of the peace ever occurred in respect of processions along it in the past. It is not expected that the adoption of this route will excite any disturbance in the future, but the Magistrate will of course adopt such precautions to maintain the peace as may appear to be necessary.

3. I am requested that these orders may be communicated to the memorialists in reply to their petition.

It was martyrdom, and for to the Sunnis, who, they say, meant to bring this finds an echo in the heart of every pious them to trouble and spite the Government order, believer. The Mahomedans, almost all of them, The Sunnis, in their turn, believe that the Shias murdered the man in fulfilment of a vow on renewal of permission for the procession. The death is still a mystery. The only visible action of the Police was to warn the leading Sunni gentlemen of the city to keep the peace during the

In Calcutta, there was a free fight between the taziawallas of Messrs. Cook & Co., and the Police. In consequence, the license was withdrawn for the last day.

The alam and the tazia processions have become an institution of this city. On the seventh day of the Maharram, the alam of Mirza Mehdi proceeds through Colootola, Bowbazar and Lal Bazar Streets. The day after, Haji Agha Kerbalai's alam passes along the same route. Horses representing the dead warriors and some of the Shia symbols excepting ter and mussuk are paraded. The eighth day procession is numerously attended by men of all religions and sects, Sunnis, Marwaris, Jains, Khettris, Bengalis. A spirit of religious tolerance and amity narks the scene. On the tenth day the two combined march through Lal Bazar and Bowbazar Streets and Upper Circular Road to Haji Kerbalai's garden. This year a new alam was seen to emerge from Anthonybagan Lane. It was owned by Syed Mahomed Taha, employed in the railway office. On the tenth day, the horse just in front of the coffin of Imam Hossein seemed to be pierced with arrows and the cloth covering the animal was coloured red. This feature was not observable on the seventh or the eighth day. The three alams had one horse each of this variety. The tazias followed the alams generally and they were dropped into the Kerbala tank at Manicktola. The Kerbala, a little room, was crowded with men and women. The only accident was that of a boy of ten being drowned.

From the Sealda corner to Manicktola, the two sides of the street were crowded with temporary shops vending different articles, the eastern being a continuous range to Kerbala, About twenty-five places were opened for selling pickles alone, and almost all the sellers returned home with empty jars, making a good profit. Everybody was busy buying one thing or another. Only pions Sunnis absented themselves, and if they happened to pass that way, they would not buy anything, for it was a mournful occasion and the shops would remind them of the bazaar established by the mother of Yezid, the murderer of Imam Hossein, to commemorate her son's success.

Such was the spectacle in Calcutta. In the suburban Metiaburuj, the exhibition is in its decline. They had their medhe on the seventh night which is nnknown to the town proper. It is the preliminary ceremony of marriage between Kasem and his cousin

Want of water, to moisten parched The poor man had been taken to work in the lips, there was none; the children and the whole fami-Emambara on the alam eve and was not seen by were dying of thirst encamped in their tent. Still observe these days with great and real sorrow. But the methods of manifestation differ. The Sunnis mourn in silence, while the Shias emphasise their feelings by symbols indicative of the events of those days. With all, however, the murder of the grandsons of the Prophet is equally painful.

INTERFERENCE WITH NATIVE STATES.

The question of how far we are justified in interfering with the internal administration of Native States is one about which there are various opinions. Some say that we should leave them severely alone, and allow them, so to speak, to stew in their own juice; others again say that the British Government should interfere in all cases of injustice; that the Resident at the Capital of an independent State should be the ultimate court of appeal; and that our responsibility for good government and justice is not merely confined to British India, but extends also to our protected and feudatory States. There is a good deal to be said for the latter argument; for it must be always borne in mind that since the introduction of the "Pax Britannica" we have taken away from the duction of the "Pax Britannica" we have taken away from the people the only and time honoured remedy of oriental nations against a despotic and oppressive government, t. t., revolt and assassination. We act as the Police of India to keep the peace throughout the land, and this protection is of considerably greater benefit to the independent Princes than it is to the peoples under their sway. The result is that injustice is often committed and oppression is practised, against which the people have no remedy; because while we prevent them from indulging in any outburst of indignation we refuse to interfere in matters which concern the internal administration of an independent State. This word "independent" is a very inisleading one. The condition of affairs at the end of this nineteenth century is very different from what it was at the commencement. A hundred years ago, the different native States were either our enemies or our allies. In the course of time states were cure our times of the latter have fallen into the second rank of subordinate States. No one will for a moment pretend that in the case of a question of Imperial policy affecting the whole country, we should be justified in yielding to the wishes of one or more States merely because they claimed to be independent. In such a case their profess would not be regarded, and they would be compelled to contorm with the Imperial policy, treaties and agreements notwithstanding. When the Queen became Empress of India, the whole condition of the relations between the Imperial Government and the Native States became changed. This being so, if we refuse to recognise the independence of the vassal States in a matter of Imperial policy, are we justified in refusing to interfere in matters of public Justice and good government in which the interests of the millions under their charge are concerned? The different States may have their own laws and customs and their own system of revenus, taxation and administration. These are all more or less founded upon civilized bases, and the people who reside in such States do so with their eyes open, - a remark especially applicable to strangers who of their own accord take up their domicile in such countries. But it is the administration and execution of those laws with which we have to do; for it depends upon the manner in which they are administered whether justice is done or injustice is committed.

The Queen-Empress being the over-lord of the States, I maintain that the subjects of a Native ruler have as much right to expect redress for injustice from the hands of her representatives as have her immediate subjects. But as long as we refuse to interfere in matters of internal administration, they are not always sure of rematters of internal administration, they are not always sure of receiving that justice, and are debarred from appealing to the British representative. The British Resident at a Native Court should be something more than passive. He should be the Guide, as well as the Philosopher and the Friend. As far as the States themselves are concerned, the policy I advocate is the kindest in the end. The stewing-in-their-own-juice policy, is calculated to lead, in the long run, to maladministration, which compels an interference of a far more active kind, if not actual annexation. In many of the Zobeyda, the daughter of Imam Hossein, in the field of Kufa. But what an unhappy end! The marriage is changed into a funeral. The bride, before night, has to cast her eyes on the cossin of "interference with an independent State" is apt to be raised, whenever the Resident endeavours to advise it for its own good. This outery generally proceeds not so much from the Princes themselves as from their officials, who, for the most part, have been borrowed from the British service, or who have immigrated from British Provinces. I by no means advocate a nagging and petty interference in matters of detail; but where the carrying out of the laws, or where justice is concerned, the subjects of a native State have, I maintain, as much a right to look to the representative of the Imperial Government for protection against misude and oppression, as the Princes themselves are entitled to our protection from rebellion and anarchy.

ELEPHANT LORE.

Elephants are a survival from an age incalculably remote, whose flora and fauna are known to us only in coal measures and fossil remains. In this prosaic century, when steam and electricity conspire to abridge toil and simplify mechanical contrivances, their wast, unwieldy forms seem altogether out of place. Their genesis and death alike are shrouded in mystery. For pairing they select torest depths unapproached by man. The Garos and Lushais, whose country swarms with elephants, declare that when one feels his end approaching, he betakes himself to some land beyond mortal ken. However frequent one's opportunities may be of watching their movements, it is impossible to be really familiar with them, or to avoid feeling that there is great gulf fixed between these pachyderms and the rest of creation. Babu Gvanendra Narain Ray Chaudhuri, a scion of a family well-known in the Rangpur district, has raised a corner of the veil which shrouds elephant-life, and his little book, at present available only in a Bengali garb, teems with quaintly-expressed facts, not unmixed with fatteies, on this fascinating subject. The popular errors which cluster round the elephant would have enraged and disheartened Sir Thomas Browne. One relates to the period of gestation, which is commonly supposed to be 18 months. Two years would be nearer the mark. Another concerns the suckling of tiny specimens. Nine people out of ten imagine that a baby helps himself to his mother's milk with his trunk: the fact being the mouth is used, as is the case with all warm-blooded animals. But it is a thankless task to combat ignorance. A good story on this point is to be found in one of the oriental text-books. Elephant dealers have quite as many tricks of trade as their con-frères the horse-copers. At a certain Fair one of the confraternity was showing off a huge specimen to an intending buyer, and enlarg-ing, as is the manner of his tribe, on its splendid points. While thus engaged, he observed a yokel gazing at the animal intently and then engagea, ne onserven a yoke gazing at the animal intentity and then glanteing alternately at the customer and himself. The dealer took him aside and slipped a brace of gold moliurs into his hand, whispering, "Don't you say anything about it and you shalf have as much more after the sale!" The rustic nodded sagaciously, and held his peace. When the deal had been satisfactorily concluded, the vendor approached the supposed accomplice and said :-- "Well, here's the rest of your money; but, tell me, how did you find out what was the matter with my elephant?" "I find anything out?" replied the young man from the country, carefully securing the "tip" in lys waist-cloth, "I had never seen an elephant before, and was wondering what sort of a beast yours could be!" A newand was wondering what sort or a ocast voirs could be!" A new-born elephant is of a pinkish colour, which deepens with age into the familiar dusky hue. It is weaned at six months; but for the first 7 or 8 years of its life it remains in statu pupillars, following its mother with touching persistence and fed by her with the tenderest leaves that the jungle affords. The milk-teeth drop out in the fifteenth year, and are succeeded by the permanent molar dentition. physiology. Indeed, they form the basis of the native system of classification. tusks are of slower growth, and are of vast importance in the animal's

Males are either (1) Dantals, (2) Ganeshes, (3) Makhnas. The first species includes all provided with tusks. It is subdivided into 6 categories. First and foremost is the Palanga Dantal, so called because in ancient days kings were wont to recline on a couch, palang, fastened to the well poised tusks of some favourite monster, which would march into a tank or river and give its insister a bath by slowly ducking its head. The tusks in this sort are 3 to 4 feet in length, curving gently upwards. Next is the Surat Dantal, where massive tusks curve downwards. So rapid is their growth that, ninless repeatedly sawm short, they touch the ground. The third is the Chokna Dantal, whose tusks are stumpy—never longer than 18 inches, and slope npwards. The fourth is the Mula Dantal, so named because its tusks taper like the common or garden radish. Fifth comes the Nala Dantal. Nal means "reed;" and the tusks of this kind are thin and scraggy. Lastly, we have the Akas Dantal, in which one tusk points upwards (akasa is the Sanskrit for H-aven), and the other to the nether region. Such beasts are regarded as inauspicious, and the more so when the tusks are a series of knobs, like mushapen billiard balls. The next great division, the Ganeshes, have but a single tusk on the right side, like the elephant-headed god of the Hindu Pantheon. They are regarded as peculiarly auspicious and have a value far above their deserts. Elephants with a solitary task on the left side are sometimes wrongly styled "Ganeshes." Their proper designation is Ekdanta, and they are of no great value. The third grand division of males, the Makhnas, are by a lious natural, destitute of tusks or have but rudimentary ones. They are have and hard-working; hence greatly appreciated in the huming-field. In that sphere they possess the great advantage over tuskers of having no protuberances to become entangled in cane or creeper jungle. When very staunch, a Makhna commands a high price, but ordinary ones are of no great account. Apart from their want of an elephant's chief ornament, they have the creati of being sulky and not always to be trusted. Female elephants or klunkes are called Mevari if they are madens, and Chui if they have given birth to young. Like Makhnas, they are only esteemed when staunch shikaris, and then command fancy prices. The age of an elephant has no relation to its colour, and it is a vulgar error to suppose that white or reddish spots on the head and trunk are an indication of antiquity. Until fifteen or thereabouts it has black toe nails; thereafter the nails grow gradually whiter. Up to thirty-five the upper portion of the cass is erect and firm, but as lite advances it droups perceptibly. The degree of curvature of the deck and depth of the hollows above the eves enable experts to detect an aged animal.

The next point is the size, which appears to vary with the habitat Those hailing from Nepal, Bhutan, and Sikkim are, like the points of those regions, thickset, haid-working and "confilential." Ninety per cent, are under eight feet, and nine are never exceeded. This species is usually hog-backed. In Bhutan elephants abound, and the Raja occasionally gives passes to trappers. The Nepal Durbar, on the other hand, discourages kheddah operations and turns imported animals loose to keep up the stock. But the Garod and Khasia hills in north east Bengal are the happy hinting grounds par excellence. They are thinly peopled and seamed with broad valleys which furnish an abundant supply of succulent fodder. Hence the elephants canght there are the bulkiest of their race. Eleven feet is quite an ordinary height, and grants are met with approaching thitteen feet. Their docility is equally remarkable. The yearly catch in the kheddah eampagins underraken by Government and by private parties, is between four and five hundred, while the supply is practically mexhanstible. The beauty and excellent qualities of Gaio elephants are recognized throughout India. In the Decean they fetch Rs. 15,000 and upwards. Those captured on the Khasia and Jamita Hills run them close; but their numbers are decreasing. They are also found throughout the Manipuri conntry, and in Hill Tippera the Maharaja derives no small proportion of his scanty recenues from the levy of royalties on those trapped in his jungly domains. The annual take there is about 150, but fine specimens are rare. The art of capturing and training elephants has made some advance of late years, thanks to the genius of the late Mr. Sanderson; but in all essentials the methods in use are of hoary antiquity. There are thire approved systems—the Kot, or enclosure, Phansi, Noose, and Paratal, of which more presently. Phere is, indeed, a fourth, in which the wild animals are driven into pits deep enough to render escape hopeless. The injury to their chief pride, the tisk, in the fall o

The Kot is used by experts operating on a large scale. When the cold weather sets in, a camp is formed on a level space near the tract known to be haunted by the huge quarry. This contains ample stores of food for the army employed, often numbering more than a thousand men, as well as for the prospective catch. Then the "seekers," jauts, hereditary foresters acquainted with all the habits of the animals, are sent forward to spy out a herd. When one has been announced, the next point is to ascer-tain in what direction it is moving. Then a division of the beaters about 400 strong is sent forward to enclose it in a wide encle who carries a gun, the rank and file being armed with spears and axes. Meantime another division have been busdy engaged in erecting a gigantic pound, the ket, into which the cliphants ore The wall is composed of trunks of trees eighteen feet long by three and a half in diameter, embedded in the soil at intervals of 18 inches. It is further secured by layers of heavy bamboos secured jungle-wood. Round the interior, six feet from the teneing, there jungice-wood, rooms are interior, six reservoir the teneng, there runs a ditch as broad and wide, so placed in order to prevent the prisoners charging with their full force against the fence. The latter is pierced, on the side whence the prey is expected, by an opening twelve feet wide, 'secured by a massive door, falling through grooves as a portenllis. Its interior side is studded with sharp nails. This gateway is flanked on its exterior by side-walls there in the sale was a shall the diameter of the enclosure, forming, as it were, the section of a funnal, the door being the small end. This is termed the yard, or angma; and across its broadest part are spread three parallel ridges of dry straw. When all things are ready, the division of the little army which has been hemming in the herd throws back its wings on the side nearest the enclosure leaving an apparently free egress in that direction. Then com-mences a file-firing of blank Cartridge, with an accompaniment of blood-cardling yells; and the frightened annuals rush frantically towards their dooin. On entering the yard and observing how rapidly it narrows, the herd often attempts to execute a "strategic movement to the rear." Then the straw at the entrance of the vard is lit, and fire, the elephants' most dreaded foe, completes their discomfiture. The maddened brutes press eagerly into the narrowing yard and so enter the enclosure. Then two men who have been holding up the sliding gateway, let it fall with a mighty crash, and the prisoners' fate is scaled. Soon afterwards, two powerful trained females khankes enter the yard and take their stand on either side of the gateway. The portcullis is raised and stand on either side of the galeway. The portuins is taken and a troop of other khinkies, each bestridden by a mahout, enter the enclosure. If a rush be made for freedom, the elephant gatekeepers deal the fugitives terrific blows with their trunks. now one of the captives is singled out for the process of breaking. Four femiles surround him one with a rope-ladder hanging Down this her mahout deftly slides, and attaches another rope-ladder to the hind leg of the quarry, repeating the process till the latter has a drag of 80 pounds or so in weight hampering his movements. Then he is driven by the khunkies outside and firmly secured by ropes to a tree. Thus begins his first lesson in civilization.

The second, or phani method of capturing elephant is based on the use of a sort of lasso. A herd of wild animals is followed by experts mounted on trained khunkies. When a likely-looking one is overtaken, the khunkies are driven close to him and one of the mahouts, learning forward, slips a heavy moose over his head. The poor heast, at the touch of the rope, doubles back his trunk, and thus the noose is easily drawn round the neck. The ends of the rope are promptly made fast on either side to two khunkies which draw it tight, reducing their victim to a state of semistrangulation. His hind feet are then fettered with masses of rope, strangulation. His hind feet are then fettered with masses of rope. The third system known as paratal, requires the use of five perfectly-trained khunkies. It comes into play for the capture of solitary males or gondar giants driven from a herd by the superior provides of a rival and given to carrying death and ruin for miles beyond the forest precincts. When the approach of a gonda is signalled, chase is given by the troop of tame animals, tour of which, without riders, press round and jam him so tightly that he is unable to sir. The fifth, which carries a mahout and two trackers, keep in the back ground till the quarry is thus helpless. Then she joins the struggling group; and one of the experts sides down and attaches a rope drag to the hind leg of the captive monster.

Newly-caught elephant suffer most acutely, and evince their feelings by moods varying with their dispositions. Some sulk and refuse all noutishment. Others go mad with impotent rage; and cases have been known in which creatures in this plight, have flung themselves on the ground with such violence as to perish trom the shock. Generally, however, the meretricious bland-ishments of the trained khunkies end in soothing this violent despair. But captives must be kept for a week at least in the shade, well fed and accustomed to human society, before the breaking process can commence. It is astonishing how quickly they grasp the situation. Some years ago, while serving on the eastern frontier, I paid a visit to a newly-captured herd, the fruit of the Maharaja of Hill 'Fippera's kbedda operations. On this occasion I was greatly struck with the docility and resignation of the poor brutes, just torn from their forest homes and forced to bend their poord necks to the yoke. Some, which had been ranging the hills a few days previously free as air, were to be seen being driven to water by a boy. I know of no other wild animal which, captured in an adult state, is capable of being so speedily domesticated. Is this susceptibility a proof of brain-power above or below the average? There is one curious fact which hardly bears out the elephants' legendary character for sagacity. It railely or never occurs to one, however sullen or furious he may be, to drag a mahout from his own or his neighbour's back with the trunk.

The process most in vogue for training is called ibatka. The feet and neck of the wild animal are firmly secured to his posts driven into the ground and thus he is rendered helpless. His hide is then vigorously rubbed by a dozen or more inshouts, using huge brushes made of eight-foot bamboos with their ends split. If the patient resent this treatment by a sweep of his trunk, a spearman posted on either side corrects him with a genile thrust. After a while, however, he yields to the soothing influences of this rough shampooing, and is then rubbed down with straw. After this process has been often repeated and the animal is accustomed to the presence of mankind, two of the mahouts venture to mount him, under the protection of tame khunkies pressing him closely and spearmen brandishing their weapons near his head. Then begins his first lesson. A khunki is ordered to go through the postures required in full view, and the novice must kneel and rise as she does on pain of a stab or a battering on the head with the heavy goad used by mahouts. In case of prolonged recalcitrance the pupil is jammed between two khunkies so tightly rendered powerless. In the eastern districts the recruit stands in up to his belly during this ordeal : for the fluid allays the pain of the spear thrust and lessons his irritation. It is said that animals treated with this modicum of consideration are more easily tamed than others. But, as in education generally, love is a more potent factor than fear. Elephants soon respond to attention shown potent factor than rear. Beppnants soon respond to accention snown them; and patience on the part of a trainer brings their best qualities into play. As soon as the breaking-in process is complete, the product is hought up by dealers, who take their purchases long distances in the hope of disposing of them at a profit. Throughout Northern Bengal it is the custom with zemindars to buy up young, them at one of the great annual Fairs. In February last I visited the Singhessur Mela, and was amazed at the display of elephants. They were tethered in hundreds under the mango-trees of a tope fully a mile square. Rembrandt alone could have done justice to the scene, when the ruddy glow of countless camp fires was reflected by long lines of giants engaged in discussing their suppers of pipal-leaves. An owner told me that he had just sold a beast for Rs. 15,000 which he had bought at the fair four years previously for Rs. 800.

Elephants should be kept in lofty stables facing the north; nothing is so injurious to them as glare. This filkbana should be as earl as possible; and be under the master's eye, for the tricks of mahouts are legion. The floor must be smooth and well-paved, to admit of its being kept scrupulously clean. If the bare ground to admit of its being kept scrupulously clean. If the bare ground be considered good enough, the filkhana must be moved frequently, in order to prevent the evil consequences to health of a soil saturated with facal matter. When the stud is numerous, great care must be taken to keep the animals from trespassing on each others domain. Like the rest of what used to be called the "brute creation," elephants have a strong sense of property in the quarters assigned them; a characteristic, by the way, which strongly militates against the socialistic theories so much in vogue in our expiring century

SEVEN POUNDS IN ONE WEEK.

Nor every man who is thin would thank you for fattening him.

NOT every in an who is thin would flank you for fattening him. He doesn't wint to be fat and for very good reasons. Unnecessary fat is a load to carry about; it interferes with a man's power to work, shortens his wind, and dulk his wirs.

Yer, on the other band, a certain amount of flesh is needed for bealth and comfon. For example: A man five feet high should weight about 120bs, ; and man five feet six inches, 145lbs, ; a man six feet, 178lbs. It is a regular ascending scale. The insurance companies allow a variation of 7 per cent, above or below it, and beyond those limits charge an extra premium. One shouldn't be much over in under his proper weight if he wants to be sound and hearty—and we all do his proper weight if he wants to be sound and hearty-and we all do

Now we will tell you how Mr. Thomas Crosby, being under weight.

Naw we will tell you haw Mr. Thomas Crosby, being inder weight, gened seven points in a week. He had lost 1½ stone, which is too much off for a man who wis never fleshier than he naturally ought to be. It was this way. He was right enough up to May, 1891. At that much be began to feel ill and out of soits. He had a naisy taste in his nouth—like rotten eggs, he says—and a thick, sliny stiff came on his gums and teeth. His appetite failed, and what he did eat was, as you might say, under compulsion; and right afterwards he would have great pain in his stomach and chest. Plantly, something was amiss with him to that region. He was often dezy, and cold chills ran over him as though he were threatened with fever. Of course we should expect a man who is handled in this way to lose strength. Mr. Crosby lost strength. In fact, he got so weak and nervous that he shoulk all over, and his hands trembled as if a current of electricity were running through him. through him

To use his own words: "I rapidly lost flesh, was 1½ stone lighter, and could hardly walk about. Once my parents thought I was dying, and sent in haste for the doctor. I saw two doctors in Epworth and one and sent in haste for the doctor. I saw two doctors in Epworth and one at Haxey, bin they were not able to help me. Our vicar, Rev. Mi. Overton, recommended me to the Lincoln Infirmary, where I attended for eight weeks as an out-loon patient, without benefit. "Soon afterwards Mr. Shatp, a chemist, at Epworth, spoke to me of the virtues of a medicine known as A. other Seigel's Cunative Syrup. Being interested in what he said, Heft infit tying other things and began taking this Syrup. In a few days I felt better, and presently I gained seven pounds in a week. At that rate I soon gut back to my work, and have had the best of health ever since. Hell these facts to everybody, and ann perfectly willing they should be published. Yours truly (Signed), Tow. CROSBY, Ferry Road, Epworth, via Donicastei, December 23:d, 1892."

After reading Mr. Crosby's story we scarcely need to ask why he lost flesh. The immute he stopped eating and digesting his usual allowance of food he began to fall away. Trees, they say, grow as much from the air by means of their leaves, as they do from the soil. But men don't. They've got to be built up through their stomache. Indigestion and dyspepaid (Mr. Crosby's complaint) stops this process and pursons those who have it, betides. That accounts for all the painful and dangerous symptoms our friend speaks of. The doctors do what they can, but, unluckily, they don't possess the medicine that goes to the bottom of this disease and cues it. The remody is Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and nothing else, so far as we know. It restores digestion, and digestion covers the bones with fat enough for health and good looks.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE LADY JANE GREY.

On hill and stream the morning beamed, The fresh and fragrant morn, And through the woodland cheerily The huntsman wound his horn : And lords and ladies, richly dight, The gallant and the gay, Had vowed to waken with the light The pastime of the day.

Within her chamber, far apart, In simple garb attned, Of modest mien, and brow serene, A lady sat retired. In meditative mood she sat, And scanned the magic page. The dreamy and mysterious lore Of Greece's poet-sage.

And when the sound of horn and hound Broke full upon her ear. " They wist not in their sports," she cried, " What pleasure I have here : They wist not, Plato, of the joy, The rapture that I feel, The ' Paradise of rare device ' Thy fantastes teveal."

The tranquil day has passed away, Its sunny hours have sped, And gathering clouds begin to lower Around the fated head : The guileless truth of early youth, Its faith and trust remain, But other cares and other friends Surround the Lady Jane.

The heartless wiles of crafty men Already bem her in, The perils of the trusting heart In sober sooth begin ; Before her feet adventurers lay The glittering bauble down : The haughtiest knee in England bends To tender her-a crown !

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deaf-less, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely imperseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VICTORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTRAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

" My lords," she said, " for one so young, 'I were maidenly and meet To take your counsels for a lamp And guide unto my feet : Albeit, I have never sighed Nor sought for high degree ; The gauds and gluter of a court Have little charm for me.

" I reverence your sage resolves, Your subtlety admit, And weak and worthless at the best I know is woman's wit; But God has fortified my soul Against this trying hour, And in His 'faith and fear ' I shun The path to regal power.

" How often in disast'rous feuds Hath English blood been shed ! What living man, my lords, could bear Its curse upon his head? Were it not better to unite, And bid dissension cease, That so we might advance the reign Of righteousness and peace?

" May God protect our English homes, And bless my cousin's reign " A sudden shout was raised without, " Long live the Lady Jane !" Arise, ye loyal Londoners. And shout for Jane the Queen ! The peerless choice of England's voice ! The monarch of sixteen !

The pageant gay has passed away, The garish dream has flown . In sad and silent prison-room The captive sits alone. The wasted form, and broken heart-The chamber in the tower-Are these the sole memorials left Of that brief day of power?

But ne'er was sufferer's brow, methinks, So placid and serene : Angelic grace had left it's trace In her submissive mien : "He can not err whose hand," she cried, "The universe sustains; And welcome every change and chance His Providence ordains."

And as the parting hour drew nigh, Her faith the stronger grew Sa young, so good, so beautiful, Sa constant and so true I In vain the zealous priest of Rome Essayed, with honeyed tongne, To win her from the cherished creed To which she fondly clung.

" Sir Abbot," with a smile she cried, Your subtle reasons spare : My heart is fixed and resolute :-In courtesy forbear : To argue for my faith is not For one so weak as I; But in it, by the grace of God, And for it I can die !

" And tell my cousin -since, you say, She mourns my suiful state-I have a ghostly counsellor In this my mortal strait. Tell her I freely own my fault, And recognize her right; She loves me not, and soon the grave Will hide me from her sight

" May all her subjects duteously Incline unto her will : And God forgive me, if I e'er Have wished or thought her ill Tell her that though the flesh be frail, The spirit feels its might, And longs to burst its bonds, and soar Rejoicing into light !

" Commend me to my father's prayers, And to my loving lord I charge you as a Christian man To take my dying word : It mitigates the stroke of death, The pang of parting pain, To think that we who loved so well So soon shall meet again !"

"I is said that on the fatal morn. From her secinded cell She saw Lord Guildford pass to death, And waved a last farewell Nay more, she saw, too plainly saw, Beneath her window borne, Oh sight of speechless agony His headless trunk return.

Her fortitode had well-nigh failed Beneath the cruel shock : But caimly, martyr-like, she laid Her hend upon the block. And long shall fame enshrine her name Among the great and good; The image of heroic fault And guileless womanhood.

And brightly her example suit Sinnes through the mist of years . The gentle and the true embalm Her memory with tears : By winter fires her tale is told, And never told in vain, As children listen to the Life And Death of Lady June.

AT the German town of Insterburg, they have started an Association for the Prevention of Scandal in Society. Each member is bound " to denounce to the president all those who are detected in backbiting their neighbours, giving full details, the names of the persons with whom the report originated, those who helped to spread it and the witnesses to prove it." The Association then calls upon the injured person to proceed against the offender, and offers financial aid if necessary. The members would be more useful if they directed themselves against the origination than the growth of scandals. It is likely, however, that in attempting to check an evil, they will unconsciously help on its spread. The money could be better expended in other ways. At the same time, the establishment of the society may be an indication that the evil which it is intended to suppress has grown enormously. Whatever the necessity, the system of espionage cannot be beneficial to society. It has a tendency to degenerate into terrorism and blackmailing.

THE World's last "Celebrity at Home" is Sir Edwin Arnold. The writer says:—

"Poet, Internateur, journalist, traveller though he be, the handsome flat wherein Sir Edwin Arnold finds a pied-d terre bears lew indications of his eventful life or of his long residence in India and winderings over the land of the Rising Sun, whose people he learned to love so wen. A large square anterioon leads into what is naturally the most interesting portion of his home—the bright, cheerful study so characteristic of the man. A tiny despatch-box—the companion of many journeys—stands on a small table, and is quite large enough for one who, with such orderly, methodical habits, kingws where to put his hand on any paper required, and 'can write on the top of a hat as well as any-where else.' The bookcases contain only a few felics of a once vast library, for Sir Edwin disikles accumulations, and considers that portable property is a great nuisance. Wherefore he has twice dispersed his books and household gods among his children, so as to be free of effects: nevertheless, there are some inthe possessions of interest which he retains, 'only for the present,' he remarks significantly. 'Those who see my flat know I live elsewhere; and though I make books, I never keep them.' Among the pictures on the walls there is one of the Emperor of Japan on horseback, another of Prince Siddantha drawing the curtain over the couch of his sleeping wife before he went forth on his act of renunciation, and a fine proof-before-letters engraving of Noel Patrons' 'Obeion and Titaina.' There are plenty of deep, comfortable lounging-chairs, presumably for the use of his friends; for Sir Edwin himself, with perfect physical health, never knows what it is to be tired or to have had even one headache, and attributes it to the fact that he never fiets, never hurites, and looks upon life as a fine art, and that it is as reasonable to study to preserve a healthy body for the soul as it is for a good soldier to keep his scabbard in order fire himself blade. And y

Nor was he distinguished in official and social life only. With the physical vigour and activity which do not generally go with powerful intellects, he was an ardent sourcisman, and had many thrilling adventures while in pursuit of big game' and out pig-sticking.

full of the imagery of poetry, Su. Edwin Arindle possesses a peculiar simplicity of character, together with a magnetic power of sympathy and a detestation of all uncharitableness. His conversation is full, now o sparking anecdote, and of thirling pathos, as may suit the subject while the gentle, courteous manner has a charm all its own. His bright-sparking anecdote, anon of thinling patios, as may suit the subject, while the genute, courteous nanner has a charm all its own. His brightness is infectious; it seems to brace and invigorate even the most depressed of those with whom he comes in contact, and to cause them to look upon life through his own rose-coloured glasses.

Sir Edwin Arnold's foreign Orders alone are a collection of curiosities, The Light of Avia' brought him the decuration of the White Elephant from the King of Siam; the Order of the Lion and Sun came from the Siahi of Persa to the production of another fascinating volume, 'With Sad in the Garden; or, the Book of Love,' a poem founded on a single chapter of the work of the Persain poer Sad. In later years, during his visit to Japan, the Emperor conferred on him the Order of the Riving Sun, which carries with it the dignity of Chokunion of the Empire; not ospeak of the Imperial Order of the Medjidieh from the Sultan and Imperial Order of Osmanle. The decuration Companion of the Sica of Indian is not be occasion of the preclamation of the Queen as Empress of India; and eleven years after he was created Kinght Commander of the Indian Empire. IT is said that

It is said that

"the notification issued a few days ago by the Governor-General in Council, ordering the discontinuance of the grant of drawbacks of duty on cotton-goods exported from British ports to Native States, is the first step towards carrying into effect the proposal the Government of India have lately pressed upon the Fenditiones for the levy of a five per cent, excise duty on cotton yrins of 20's count and above. The design of this measure, it is stated, is to bring the conditions under which cotton manifactures are carried on in Nitve States where mills exist into conformity with those obtaining in British India. Unless the principalities concerned agree to this arrangement, the Government of India, it is stated, will take special measures to prevent the importation of cotton goods made in such States into British India."

We may here explain the attitude token by Lord Stanley of Alderley in regard to the cotton industry in this country and the silk industry in England. He spoke twice and against the cotton excise duties. On the first occasion, Lord Reny had answered only the question on the Notice and not what was asked about the India Office over-ruling the Indian Government as to the difference of 24 and 20 counts. So Lord Stanley reverted to the subject, and contended that, the difference was protection to Laucashire. This time Lord Konberley answered, explaining that the Government of India had the power to alter, if it found it neces sary, 20 to 24 counts. Notwithstanding that reservation in the Aci, the excise duty is nojust to India. It was plain, that her Majesty's Government could not move in the matter without a sop to Manchester. Lord Stanley was for a duty on foreign silk to save the expring silk industry in England.

THE elected members of the Bengal Council are coming in one by one. The first to sit was Mr. A. M. Bose. He is followed by Rai Bahadoor Eshan Chunder Mitter, who took his seat last Satinday and is gazetted this week.

THE Dacca Division, as represented by the four delegates from the four District Boards, has chosen Bahon Guruprosad Sen as its representative to the Bengal Council. It is not to be supposed that they have used their discretion or were unanimous. Only three voted for Mr. Sen. The increase of one vote is due to the retigat. of the other candidate. "No. 3396 A. Appointment Department.

From -H. J. S. Cotton, Esq. C. S. 1,
Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.
To-The Commissioner of Dacca,

Sir.—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 1:91G, dated the 3rd July 1895 reporting that the electoral representatives of the District Boards in the Dacca Division were unable to agree among themselves by a majority for the recommendation of a member to st in the Bengal Council.

2. In reply I am directed to the property of the recommendation of the second council and the second council a to six in the bengar Council.

2. In reply I am directed to say that although no rule was framed allowing for the adjournment of a meeting of electoral representatives, there is no rule against such adjournment, and that it is always contemplated by the Lieutemant-Governor that on such a deadlock as this occurring, the delegates would adjourn and sit day by day and comoccurring, the decigates would adjourn and sit day by day and con-numerate with their constituents and come to some decision at last. Sir Charles Elhott trusts that they will do so now, and you are re-quested to convene them again for the purpose. The power of Govern-ment to nominate in default of election does not alise until after the expiration of two months from the day on which you issue your invita-tion to the District Boards to elect a representative but the Lieutenant Governor does not desire to avail himself of this power, and hopes that the delegates will be able to agree on, or to decide by a majority in favour of, one man.

The interpretation of the rule is reasonable. But it does not entirely remove the difficulty which may recur again. The initial mistake of an even number of delegates to choose a representative is rectified in the present instance by the retirement of a candidate. We are grateful to Sir Charles Elliott for not seizing an opportunity of nominating a Member of his own selection.

The Bhagalpur delegates have not been wained by the Dacca example. There is a tie there also. Mr. George Hennessy and Rai Banadar Survya Naram Singh have obtained equal votes. The Bhagalpur elections have been the most contested. There were four candidates and every attempt was made to keep out the European.

As usual, the current number of the Imperial and Asiatic Quarterly Keview is varied. It has now additional interest for India. The East India Association has dropped its nwn journal, and the important papers read there will be published in this quarterly. The July number thus opens with a shorthand report of an Address by Su Richard Temple to the Association at its annual meeting, dealing with "India in Parliament in 1894-95 and the Situation in India." There is more than one paper on India. List work, we reproduced a note on "Int-reference with Native States" by "Ex-Political," He recommends interference with the internal administration of Native States. His advice is that "the British Resident at a Native Court should be something more than passive. He should be the Guide, as well as the Philosopher and the Friend "

The relations between the Paradionnt Power and the Native Princes may not be clearly defined. But there can be no question that, in Name Principality, the British Resident, if not the British Government, is more powerful than the Prince. The Ruler is in constant dread of the Representative. The Prince's whole ann and object is to keep the Resident in good humour. If he is dissatisfied, there is no peace for the Prince. The Principality may not be swept away, but the Prince is nowhere. The British Government also has as complete a control as it could wish or feel disposed to exercise. Short of annexation, its power is supreme. It can seize a Prince in his own territory, and, after degrading him by an open trial, depose him, and set up a new dynasty, without the cause being made public. Oi, it' may quietly send a Prince on exile from his own territories. The Prince is not at liberty to dismiss a servant that is obnusious to him, or retain one that is not in the good book of the Resideot. If temporarily suspended, the Prince cannot even spend his own or bi-way a first what need then for a clearer definition or bi-W. Or, for open powers? The interference being already or nich side is it desirable to extend it?

THE Hewrah-Sheakhala Trainways Company, Limited, has a history of its own. It is several years that Masses Walsh, Lovett and Co., of Calcutta, were moved by a few of the foremost men of the Serampore Sub-Division of the Hooghly District to take up the project of a Trainway from Howish to Sheikhala through Chanditalah and Janai. To avoid acquoing loid, it was suggested to run the line along the old Benates Road or what is sometimes called Ahalya Bar's Road. Statistics were gathered to see whether the line would pay. The result was encouraging. The local traffic consisted for the most part of cart- and cattle-borne jute and corn and cocoanuts and vegetables of different kinds. The number of passengers also by cabs and palkis, moving between Howrah and Sheakhala, is respectable. To make assurance doubly sure, it was ascertained that more than half the estimated capital of a lacs would be contributed by gentlemen interested in the project. A survey was then commenced. Much time was lost in determining how the E. I. Railway line could be avoided, for no trawway can be laid along the old Benares Road as it runs westward from Salkea without crossing the railway line. It was finally resolved to commence the line from Telkalchat, at Howrah, to lead it through Bantra and then reaching the old Benores Roul at Milky to take it along that fine broad road up to Chauditala and thence after a slight deviation through Janai and the villages to its west to Sheakhala, Correspondence was opened with the Howrah Minicipality and the District Road Cess Committee for terms for use of the roads The matter had advanced very far when the firm of Messis Walsh, was succeeded by that of Messes, Martin and Co The latter took up the project or right entirest. The terms have now been settled with both the Howish Municipality and the Hooghly District Road Coss Committee. The Government of Bengal approved of the project and sanctioned it in Murch last. Messis, Martin have drawn up the mean random and articles of association, A memorandum of agreement also has been drafted to bind the firm which is to construct the line and the Company to be formed for managing it. The capital is to, be Rs. 5,40,000 in 5,400 shares of Rs. 100 each. Messis. Maini are prepared to complete the line within 18 months. They will carry on the husiness of the Company under the direction and control of the Directors. The Managing Agents will continue in office notif they resign of their own accord or are removed by a special Resolution of the shareholders. The number of Directors will not be in ite than seven or less than five. Two of the members of the firm of Messis Martin and two persons nominated by the Houghly District. Board will always be Directors, the other Directors being appointed by the shareholders. A Director must hold at least so shares

The question now is, why should the Howish Municipality be entirely ignored? It is fairly entitled to appoint one Director. Upon the same principle the Government of Bengal may claim a voice in the Directorate. It only, however, not care for the privilege and the shareholders, therefore, will not have to endure any dictation from that quarter except indirectly. The principle of shareholders appointing their own Directors is so sound and so usual that no deviation ought to be allowed noless for very strong reasons. A PETITION has been addressed by seventy-six rayyets of Nadia to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. It refers to the case noticed in our issues of February 23 and March 9 It will be in the recollection of our readers how the Magistrate of Nadia, by refusing, on the strange plea of want of establishment, to enquire into the claims of 76 rayyats for possession of their fields, allowed the disputes to be kept open, and how he afterwards induced the Government of Bengal to quarter an additional Police on the disturbed area under section 15 of Act V of 1861. The petition describes a state of things such as is possible under only an admin istration distinguished for vigour beyond the Liw. Land is meant for use or occupation. Nothing but the highest necessity can justify even a temporary suspension of its use. In Nadia, however, the Magistrate sought to forbid the use of land for an indefinite period. Fortunately, the Divisional Commissioner kept his head. At his recommendation the Government of Bengal refused to grant extension, for an unlefinite period, of the Magistrate's order under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. For all that, the Bengal Government was weak enough to accede to the Magistrate's prayer for the quartering of a special Police. The costs were directed in the notification to be realised from all the parties to the dispute. The Magistrate, however, levied them on only the rayyers, exempting the two wealthier parties totally, The special Police sat like an membus on the poor cultivators for a period of six months. During this period the Magistrate did nothing to remove the cause of the dispute by enquiring into the claims for possession. In the meantime, extension, by four months, has been granted by Government for continuance of the additional Police at the cost of the rayyets. This then is the capacity for administration displayed by the District Officer ! The action of the Magistrate is mexplicable. The poor rayyets have been kept out of their lands for successive seasons. All the while, however, their powerful landlords, have been allowed to preacefully grow indigo on the disputed land and reap the harvest.

INSANITARY CALCUTTA AND UNMAN-NERLY COMMISSIONERS.

THE Bengal Chamber of Commerce has addressed an important letter to the Bengal Government on the general insanitation of Calcutta. The city is fast ceasing to be the sanitarium that it was proving to be after the introduction of filtered water and underground drainage. On the opening of the water works, cholera had almost disappeared. The extension of sewers had purged the city of the buzzing mosquitos. Cholera and smallpox, like fever and bowel complaints, are of ordinary occurrence. Flies and mosquitos dog you at every step. The sewers which were hailed as deliverers from all evils have added a new terror in the shape of sewer gas which pursues you everywhere with nameless and unnumbered ills in its train. Typhoid is on the increase. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Chamber, as representing the European community and the commerce of Calcutta, should be alarmed. It proceeds to the business, however, in no captious spirit, but in the interest of the entire population. It is well also that the Chamber has spoken, for that anxiety for the so its voice is no cry in the wilderness. The Chamber refers to "the recurrence with greater frequence and increasing severity of those waves of disease which modern science in many other places has worked so successfully to stamp out," in addition to "the endemic ailments of the East." It next alludes to the increase of typhoid fever and is most alarmed at the dreaded approach of the China plague which is nearing the city, having arrived at Singapore. Mr. Clarke, the Secretary, exonerates the Commissioners from all responsibility for inefficient works to which they have become heir. He specifies the trenching ground at Goragacha as the danger in our midst, and suggests that no such ground should be permitted on the south or south-west of the city and the southern suburbs.

Unlike Sir Rivers Thompson, Sir Charles Elliott is not for superseding the Commissioners on the mere complaint. Nor does he take any gloomy view The action taken on the representof the situation. ation is that the Bengal Government has laid down the following rules regarding trenching grounds and has called upon the Municipality for a report on typhoidal fevers.

(5) Steps should at once be taken for acquiring the necessary area of trenching ground, and a regular scheme should be drawn up for its working; the amount of sewage to be disposed of should be estimated with reference to the population concerned; and the area necessary to deal with it on the conditions laid down above should be accurately determined. determined.

In its reply to the Chamber, the Local Government upfiolds the trenching system as the best yet discovered for disposing of focal matter. "The practice," the letter snys, "of rendering sewage innocuous by mixing it with dry earth was hailed

"of rendering sewage innocious by mixing it with dry earth was hailed not very long ago as a great sanitary discovery, and it has been largely adupted in Emope. The Lieutenant-Governor is informed that the system is successfully followed in several towns in India, and it is the universal practice of Bengal juls to dispose of faceal matter in this way, and no unpleasant results have ensued. It is the misuse and not the use of the trenching system which should be objected to. It depends for it success on the oxidising effect that a pirious substance, such as day earth, exerts by brigging any sewage with which its mixed into mitmate contact with the air contained in its porch, if crops are afterwards grown upon the land thus treated, the process of purification grees on more rapidly and certainly."

Trenching grounds cannot but be a nuisance, and we are not sure that the methods suggested will remove the evils emanating from them. No doubt much of the nuisance will not be felt if the procedure laid down be strictly followed. But the difficulty, especially in lazy Bengal, has always been to as minutely. In the rains, these open tr typical of the place reserved for the earth, the soul of this system, be alone can justify their existence. Their meetings are most crowded when an appointment is to be made. Works or estimates which require scrupulous scruitny are passed without much examination. Private and not public matters engage their earnest attention. They love to talk-to little or no purpose. Any attempt to control them in that direction is highly resented, for they are independent and fearless. The other day, they not only would not accept a proposition to limit their eloquence to reasonable lengths, but hounded the proposer, who had acted from the best of motives and spoke remarkably well. If the majority of speakers at municipal meetings could speak half as well, there would be no com-This week they exhibited a temper which is unparalleled in the history of the municipality. We have had independent Commissioners and fearless Justices of the Peace, but they were scarcely so unmannerly as several of the Commissioners proved themselves on Thursday last.

The occasion was the sanctioning of a threestoryed verandah for the new viceregal buildings for the accommodation of Government House guests, and the applicant the Military Secretary on behalf of the Viceroy. And what occasion more tempting for pitiable display of bad taste, worse manners and foolish self-importance! The loquacious majority triumphed and the thinking minority went to the The Viceroy himself had a snub. The Commissioners would not only not grant the application but were unnecessarily rude. The Town Hall had witnessed stormier municipal meetings, but we cannot call to mind one more boisterous and unmannerly. After allowing permanent unesthetical structures on footpaths in every street, lane and byelane to insanitate houses and public thoroughfares, they, when the matter grew into a scandal, adopted a rule not to allow any but an open verandah, open to the skies, over a street. We are not aware whether any departure has been made. We know however, that the Commissioners usually observe a rule, in its exceptions. There may be a valid reason for the opposition to the viceregal verandah if the application be the first of its kind. Even if it were so, we must look to the reason of the rule and not its wording. If the verandah is no impediment and is an ornament, the Corporation should hail such a structure. Perhaps the neighbouring long range of veraudah of the Great Eastern Hotel scares the Commissioners away. They had contracted beyond the law with the Company for a valuable consideration, and had allowed the structure which did not sanitarily improve the hotel premises, not for the beauty it added but for the monthly Rs. 100 it was to bring to the municipal fund. After having obtained the sanction and encroached, under it, the foot-path, the Company repudiated the contract as against the municipal law. The verandah still remains while the Company are absolved from the obligation of the monthly payment. Perhaps we are not right in introducing the other verandah. The Commissioners, following that precedent, have no objection to, in fact they have sanctioned, one-storyed verandah for the new buildings. The length of the suspension structure may probably be in its way.

We respect the feeling that would make no distinction between the great and the small in any application of law or rule. As a constitutional ruler, Lord Elgin may not act upon the slight shewn him by the rejection of the request. But as an Oriental we cannot view with unconcern the degradation of the highest personage in the empire. It is not the rejection but the manner of it that is most reprehensible.

In loyalty to the building regulations the Commissioners would not grant the Viceregal request. Are they as true to them always? Have they never allowed a structure against the byelaws? We wish some one will call for such instances of breach of byelaws. They were afraid of a precedent in the sanction of the present application. There is not another body so unmindful of the past as the Calcutta Corporation. Inconsistency is the rule with it.

We are afraid a crisis is approaching in our municipal affairs.

Metter to the Editor.

THE LATE REVD. K. M. BANERJEE.

Sir, .-- This morning I received the following insulting letter, which, I hope, you will kindly publish in your next issue with such comments thereon as may seem fit to you.

"73, Lower Circular Road, July 25, 1895.

Sir, --- When you sent me the first volume of your book, I bought it to encourage a fellow country-man, and I was both astonished and deeply grieved to read the scandalous way in which you have put my father forward to ridicule; what you have now written you should have had the courage to write when Dr. Banerjee was alive, instead of sneaking out after his death. I am surprised also that you should have taken the liberty to write about my father and us at all during our life-time. If I refused you matter for my father's life, it should have been sufficient as a man of honour to keep you from meddling with my father's name. On your own admission I can get a case against you, and I beg now that in future editions, you will be pleased to strike out Dr. Banerjee's name altogether. You have taken an unwarrantable liberty.

> Yours faithfully. M. WHIFLER"

For my part I refrain from making any harsh remark upon this letter. I simply ask Mrs. Wheeler, would she have dared write such a letter to a European author? As the daughter of Dr. Banerjee for whom I entertained a very great respect, and whom all Indian people respect, I should not write anything in any public journal against her.

Yours faithfully. RAM GOPAL SANYAL, Author of "Reminiscenes and Anecdotes of Great Men of India."

THE NATIVE PRESS OF INDIA.

By An Anglo-Indian.

"I consets that since my arrival in India nothing has filled me with such astonishment, nothing has so disheartened me, nothing has made me seel so deeply how great are the difficulties of Government in this country, as insinuations which have appeared in certain organs of the Press with regard to this subject. When the Government of India has succeeded, after many years of persistent effort, in obtaining a re-examination of the conditions of the India Civil Service, it is indeed a matter for surprise that there should be sound, I will not say amongst you, for I am happy to thin't that you have repudiated so unworthy an insinuation, but amongst some of those who represent themselves as the guides and leaders of Indian public opinion, men so incapable of appreciating what has been the character of English Rule and of its English representatives, as to assert in the sace of their countrymen that the only object of the Government of India in appointing the Civil Service Commission has been to deceive the people of India and to resort to a base, mean, and abominable trick for the purpose of restricting still further the privileges of those who are so justly anxious to serve our Sovereign in the Civil Service of their country." (Extract from Lord Dufferin's speech to the Poona Sabha, 19 November, 1886.)

The hostile attitude of a certain section of the native press towards the ruling class in Iudia which called forth the words quoted above and which is, if possible, more marked at the present time than it was in Lord Dufferin's day, affords a striking example of the difficulty of attempting to govern India on the advanced principles of the West. The hope apparently entertained by Lord Ripon that the semi-educated university graduates who in a large measure compose the journalistic class in India would wield, with honesty and moderation, the power entrusted to them by the repeal of the Press Act has unfortunately not been realized. The voice of the native press has again become loud and menacing. Several organs are nothing more than mere mouth-pieces for outbursts of hatred and contempt of British rule. By their agency class feeling is aroused among an ignorant and superstitious population to such an extent, that otherwise peaceful citizens are found flying at each other's throats, as happened two years ago in many parts of India at the festival of the 'Id, and as will happen again on the first occasion that the precautionary measures of the authorities are in any way relaxed.

The scandal is a great and growing one and in no other country in the world would the existing state of things be tolerated. A conviction, however, is gradually gaining ground that the day is not far distant when the Government will be reluctantly compelled to resort to remedial legislation. Three years ago it was considered necessary to withdraw the freedom of the press in places administered by the Governor-General but not forming part of British India proper, owing to the steady mercase of scurulous journals of the lowest type in these districts; and unless native Editors in British India are prepared to take warning by the fate which has befallen their brethern in native states and to confine themselves to fair and honest criticism of the acts of their rulers, it is by no means improbable that many of them will sooner or later find themselves in a similar predicament.

The freedom of the press in India was first established by law in 1835 by Sir Charles Metcalfe, then provisional Governor-General. It is true that the newspapers of the period were almost exclusively Anglo-Indian. The native journals could be counted on the fingers of one hand and were small and altogether unimportant, none boasting of a circulation exceeding two or three hundred copies per usue. The law, however, recognised no distinction between the two sections of the press, and the freedom then granted applied equally to all publications whether conducted by Anglo Indian or by native Editors, whether in English or in the vertaculars. This freedom the vernacular press continued to enjoy until the days of the mutiny, when, on the outbreak of hostilities in 1857, it at once became evident that only the prompt adoption of rigorous measures could prevent it from developing into an organ of treason. The authorities were equal to the occasion. A law was quickly passed rescinding the liberty of the vernacular section of the press, and giving to the Executive summary powers to prevent the circulation of any matter calculated to add fuel to the already rapidly spreading fame of rebellion. Sveral native Editors were imprisoned, and many presses in different parts of the country were confiscated. It was originally needed that this law should remain in force for one year only, but its actual repeal did not take place until 1868. The vernacular press was once more free; but the lesson of the mutiny was still fresh in the memory of all, and up to 1872 there was practically little fault to be found with it. Occasionally, it is true, Government was compelled to mark its displeasure at the tone of some particular print, but, on the whole, the press was distinctly on the side of loyalty and morality.

About that period a great impetus was given to education in India. Its advantages began to be in some measure recognised and in the growing demand for knowledge the press found increased encouragement and support. In some districts Government itself subscribed largely to the vernacular press, distributing the newspapers among the schools in the hope of further stimulating this desire for knowledge. As the spread of education increased, however, the supply of semi-educated natives soon exceeded the demand. Men began to find that as a means of obtaining a livelihood their education was in a great measure useless. Except in the service of Government there were few careers in which the training acquired in the Government colleges was of much practical value, quired in the Government coneges was or many presentation, and the number of those who could reasonably hope to obtain employment under Government, though large in itself, was small when compared with the supply. "You have educated us, you when compared with the supply. "You have educated us, you must employ us," was their constant cry. It was, of course, impossible that Government, however willing it might be, could find employment for all the graduates whom the schools and colleges were turning out. The result, as might be expected, was much discontent in the ranks of this half-educated class. Many of them turned to the press as a means of earning a living. During the years 1873-1887, the number and circulation of the vernacular newspapers largely increased, more particularly in Bengal where the number of publications was nearly doubled, and it was only natural that these men should pour into the columns of their papers what they considered their grievances. Had they stopped at that, no harm and some good might have resulted; but unfortunately they did not. The loyalty which on the whole had characterised the vernacular press gradually gave place to langucharacterised the vernacular press gradually gave piace of language calculated to excite bitter hatted and contempt of British rule. Editors became advocates and promoters of sedition. Individual Members of the Government were grossly libelled and held up to merciless ridicule and contempt. Vernacular papers in the hands of unscrupulous editors were used to intimidate and to extort of unscrupulous editors were used to intimidate and to extort money from our feudatories and native subjects. It was clear that this state of things could no longer be tolerated. The opinions of this class were of themselves of little importance, and it could be easily dealt with should occasion arise; but the Government of the day was determined that the machinery of the press should not be employed to spread disloyalty and distrust of British rule among the people of the land. It was reluctant to interfere with the freedom of the press, but the policy of non-intervention could the freedom of the press, but the policy of indi-intervention could no longer be majurated, and Ma 1878 an Act was passed by Lord Lytton's Government watch completely gagged the vernacular press. Printerwand publishers were required to enter into a bond binding themselves not to print in any vernacular publication words or signs or visible representations likely to create disaffection to the Government established by law in British India or antipathy between persons of different races, castes, religions or sects" nor to use, nor to attempt to use, any newspaper for pur-poses of intimidation or extortion. The object aimed at was thus sects "nor to use, nor to attempt to use, any newspaper for purposes of intimidation or extortion. The object aimed at was thus effectually accomplished: the disloyal and seditions utterances of a small class could no longer be communicated through the medium of the press to masses too ignorant to judge of their worthlessness. Unfortunately this "gagging act," as it was commonly called, remained in force for only three years. It was repealed in 1882 by Lord Ripon, who carned for himself a cheap popularity at the expense of sound administration ; and but little time clapsed before the gravity of the error committed was fully apparent.

So far I have endeavoured to sketch, in as condensed a form as

So tar 1 have endeavoured to secton, in as concensed a form as possible, the past history of the native press; and before proceeding to discuss its present extent and influence, a few remarks of a general nature, on the intellectual development of the people with whom the press has to deal, may not be altogether out of place. In the rapid advance towards western civilization in India during the last decade the fact the educated class bear but a very insignificant proper mass of the population is too apt to be overlock standing the great impetus to education, ignotion everywhere prevail to an extent which in England. India, it must be remembered of agriculturists. Of the 280 millions in 186 no less than 72 per cent. of the adultic a their acres have long ceased to afford adequate support to their increased number. Extreme poverty is the lot of a numerous class; yet they abhor change of any kin l, and view it with a s perstitious yet they abnor change of any kin I, and view it with a siperstitious dread hardly imaginable. I cannot better convey an idea of the incredible ignorance prevalent among this great rural population, than by quoting the following extract from the official Gazette of the Government of India, dated 27th June 1887. It is by the pen of an intelligent native o ficial and discribes graphically additional population of the period of the control o the difficulties besetting the path of progress in this country.

The following cases, which came under my personal observa-tions, will fairly illustrate the hopeless ignorance of the majority of village populations in this country. It was at Mahammadabad Post Office, in Azamgarh district, I was one afternoon sitting under a tree close to the Post Office talking to some Tahail and police officials who had called to see me. The letter-box (a big, square, omerals who had carred to account a newly painted, red one, with a big, long, projecting mouth-piece) was lying at a distance of about 20 vards from where we were sitting, waiting to be built up in the wall. A villager approached with a letter in his hand and inquired where he was to place it. The letter-box was pointed out to him. He went up to the box, took off his shoes at a little distance from it, folded his hands reverently, put his letter in the box, howed low before it and placed 2 coppers on the ground; retreated a few steps with face towards the box (walking backwards), again bowed very low, then put on his shoes and walked away. I did not discover that he had left 2 the box (walking backwards), again bowed very low, then put on his shoes and walked away. I did not discover that he had left 2 coppers on the ground close to the letter-box till some time after he had left. In another case I saw a man drop a letter into the letter-box and then putting his lips close to the mouth of the box, calling aloud (very loud) that the letter was to go to Rewah as is somebody was sitting inside the box to hear and carry out his wishes. . . . Numerous other cases of ignorance of this nature above are quite sufficient to show what class of people we have to deal with in rural parts.'

The town population is naturally many stages in advance of that of the villages, but even here it cannot be said that education has made much way among the masses.

In painting this somewhat gloomy picture of the intellectual at-inments of the people of India, I do not wish to appear to minimize the results that have already been achieved in this direction. Much has been done both by the State and by the people them-selves. The extent to which education has become popularized may be gathered from the fact that during the decade ending 1892. 93, the annual expenditure under this head from all sources rose from 186 to 229 lakhs, while the total number of educational insitutions increased from 109,085 to 144,699, and the number of pupils from 2.8 millions to 3.8 millions. These facts suffice to supplied from 2.8 millions to 3.8 millions. These facts suffice to show the success which has attended our educational system in India. Readily admitting however that in the face of great difficulties much progress has been made, what I submit, is, that the results are comparatively small in proportion to the vastness of the population. The census returns of 1801 show that only 121/2 million adults of both sexes are able to real and the so that the million adults of both sexes are able to restand the so that the percentage of those who possess the merest rudiments. Aucation is very low. If we proceed a step linther and take as our scandard the entrance examination at the Universities of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, we find that out of 70,000 candidates for matriculation during the five years ending with 1891 only 34 per cent. were successful ; while if we go yet further we find that only 1 in every 10 candidates for matriculation succeeded in obtaining a degree ; and of these, it must be remembered, only a limited few attain a standard which will bear comparison with western ideas of progress. These facts should be carefully borne in mind in any discussion regarding the freedom of the native press of India.

I now proceed to consider the native press as it exists in the present day. Owing to the ephemeral character of many native prints it is a matter of some difficulty to ascertain with accuracy the actual number of papers in existence; but I believe that there at the present time some 350 newspapers proper published under native management. Most of these are in the Vernacular, but a few are conducted in English, while others are in both and Vernacular. The Myority of these are weekly kly, the number of daily papers being under twenty, ilation is greater in Bengal than in other parts of ton, an average it does not exceed 800 to 900 to an average it. W. Hunter in his Imperial Gazetteer with circulation of native papers at about rith discontinuous of native papers at about rith discontinuous present time cannot be less than a millions a year; in other words, thhtween them. It must, however, Ad not merely the subscribers, paper; and it is probable that lands numerous as the latter. is for the benefit of those ommon, so that the true circulation of the native papers is very much larger than might first sight appear.

The first native newspaper was published in Bangali by the Serampur Mission Press in 1818; and for many verts the native press retained the stamp of its early origin; but at the present time, with the exception of a few of the Malras papers, it is almost entirely devoted to the discussion of political questions. In addition to the newspapers proper there are a coastderable number of magizines and pamphlets, but the majoruv of these are politically unimportant. In the front rank of native papers are the Danik and the Bangobasi, Bengah papers of Cilcutta, which are under one management, the Dunk being published on the first five dops of the week and the Bingolan on the sixth. The circulation of these two papers lightly exceeds that of any other paper in India; that of the former is about 6000 daily and that of the latter averages 23,000. Other well known Calcutta papers are the Hindu Pairen, the Bengali, the Amrita Basar Patrika, the Reis and Rayvet and the Indian Murror. The chief exponents of native opinion in Bombiv are the Indian Spectator, the Bombay Samadan, and the Jan Jambel. In Madras the Hindu, and Upper India the Abbin i-air of Labore and the Bharat Jiem of Benares are the most describing of mention. The native papers are of course small, few containing as much matter as is found in a single page of a London daily. While however it must be admitted that the taining as much matter as is found in a single page of a London daily. While however it must be admitted that the native press is still in its infancy, it is only necessary to turn to to the last official report on the working of the Indian Postoffice to be convinced that the circulation of newspapers is increasing at a very rapid rate. The figures given by the post office, though they necessarily fall far short of showing the actual circulation, give a very tair idea of the rate at which this circulation is extending throughout the continy. The figures I quote include Anglo-Indian papers; but there is every reason to believe that the rapid expansion indicated is rather reason to believe that the rapid expansion indicated is rather due to increase activity in the native piess, owing to extra facilities introduced in 1881 for the despatch of light news-papers through the post, than to any vity marked increase in the number of Anglo-Indian newspapers. Tiking 100 to represent the number of newspapers (excluding European papers), given out for delivery in 1883-84 the table in the foot note shows the rate of increase described. papers), given out for delivery in 1883-93 the table in the foot note shows the rate of increase during the last ten years. In 1883-84 the number of newspapers in circulation in India (excluding those exchanged with Europe) stood at 13 millions; and in 1892-93, ten years later, this total had risen to over 24 millions. These figures prove very clearly that the circulation of newspapers is increasing at a very rapid rate; but as we have just stited, they naturally fall far short of the number actually in circulation.

A few of the nature newspapers are conducted with addition.

A few of the native new-papers are conducted with ability and moderation; but too many are the mouthpieces of men whom it would be mere affectation to credit with any true feel-ing of loyalty towards the ruling power in this country; and their demoralizing influence on the ignorant cannot be questioned. They deal in no restrained sentiments, but denonnee our rule boldly and with peculiar bitterness. Many of the editors stand so deeply committed as advocates and promoters of sedition that they spare no pains to misrepresent the actions of the Government, and to this end no falsehood is too glating, no exaggeration too gross but will serve to poison the minds of their credulous readers. On the other hand it must be remembered that to supply antidores to the poisoned weapons of the native press or to effectually expose the forgenes and misstatements, in which many native writers indulged is completely out of the power of the Government, while a moment's reflection cannot but convince any dispassionage thinker that the uncheeked growth of sedition and its free circulation through the medium growth of sedition and its free circulation through the host of the press must inevitably tend to undermine the lovalty and the british crown. The attachment of the people of India to the British crown. Anglo-Indian press has, for some years past, endeavoured to diaw the attention of the Government to the growing magnitude of this evil. The Pioneer, a leading journal, has frequently commented, in strong terms, on the evil effects which result from the unbridled heense of the native press. "The official," is stated on one occasion, "is abused in terms of reckless vituperation and, in many instances, is deterred from conscients ously doing his duty. The minds of the people are poisoned against their rulers and it is obvious to the most carelesobserver that the hostile attitude of the press and its disgraceful license are every day rendering the administration more difficult These views are moreover fully shared by the more respectable portion of the native press itself, and are, in fact, held by all most every man who has at heart the welfare and prosperity of our Indian Empire.

Let us now ecamine briefly the main grounds on which it is reasonable to suppose that the present policy of non-interference with the freedom of the native press is based. They are three, Pirstly, an impression that the circulation of the papers is small and that what is written never reaches the masses. The true circulation, however, is, as I have already shown, very much larger than would at first sight appear; and though the number of native newspapers in circulation per annum does not exceed 18 millions, the number of readers is probably four or three times as great. Secondly, a conviction that these papers are so many safety valves, carrying off much that would otherwise accumulate dangerossly near the surface, and which, if deprived of an exit, might lead to the formation of secret societies on a large scale. This argument, however, loses much of its force when it is remembered that the contributors to the press are confined to an extremely small class was close which those work fined to an extremely small class,---a class which those most capable of forming an opinion declare to be completely out of touch with the masses, and profoundly indifferent to their welfare. With regard to the latter port of the argument, it is sufficient to observe that secret societies exist in countries which enjoy a free press, equally with those in which its freedom is materially curtailed; and that they will exist in India on a formidable scale only when discontent has spread itself among the masses, a state of them which the nation will be sufficient to report the state of things which the native press is doing its best to promote. Thirdly, a belief that it is preferable to ignore the evil than to interfere with the liberty of the press. Those who entertain this opinion appear to lose sight of the fact that all the usual arguments in favour of the free press fall to the ground when the very backward state of the population, to which reference has already been made, is taken into consideration. Wrong opinions no doubt yield to fact and arguments when in course of time facts and arguments are brought face to face with them; but in the India of to-day how is this to be accomplished? The people in India, born amid the ruins of an ancient civiliza-The people in India, born amid the ruins of an ancient civiliza-tion, are still in the very cradle of western progress; and their welfare is far safer in the hands of a wise and benevolent, if despotic, Government than it would be in their own. So long as this state of things exists, so long as the maintenance of absolute power in this country is a recognized necessity, there can be no question that to allow the seeds of sedition and disloyalty to be shown broad-cast by the native press is in the highest degree impolitic, and must ultimately be productive of grave political consequences completely throwing into the shade ny advantages which a free native press might otherwise confer on the country.

It has been suggested from more than one quarter that the obvious cure for the evil is to put into force the ordinary law of libel; but the inadequacy of the existing law in such cases was clearly established on the occasion of the State prosecution of the Bangabari, which, a year or two ago in the controversy over the Age of Consent Bill, exceeded the bounds of all legitimate criticism. Moreover it is unfortunately easier to set the ball rolling than to stop it; and the opportunities given by such trials for the propagation of seditious matter in a great measure nullify any good results which's conviction might otherwise effect. In all cares of this nature, so long as we have to deal with a grossly ignorant and superstitious people, the object aimed at should be the suppression of seditious matter rather than the subsequent punishment of the offenders. This can only be secured by a partial revival of Lord Lytton's press policy; and the fact that this has not already been done is attributed by the natives of India not to a wish to awold interference with the liberty of the subject which is one of the chief characteristics of the English nation, but simply to tear of the consequences of interfering with a liberty once conceded. It would not, of course, be necessary to withdraw the freedom of the native press generally. An Act might be framed on similar lines to the Press Act of 1878 empowering the Governor-General in Council to bring any bond fide native newspaper, irrespective of the language in which it is published, under the operation of its clauses by a simple Gazette Notification to that effect. Confining this power to the Governor-General in Council would be an absolute guarantee that no unnecessary or unreasonable interference with the freedom of any particular paper would be permitted. Criticism of a fair and legitimate character is essential to all progress; but carried to its present extent it cannot but exercise a harmful and disturbing infinence on the country.

lu India where, as we have already seen, education of any kind to confined within such narrow limits, its value is naturally greatly enhanced; and probably no society in the world has ever been so entirely at the mercy of this small class which regards itself as enritled by its entellectual superiority to dictate its opinions to others, as are the people of India of the present day. The unreflecting, the vast majority who possess neither the energy nor the knowledge to sift the wheat from the chaff, are entirely at the mercy of selfconstituted leaders, men, for the most part, too young and inexperienced to lead their countrymen with any safety along the path of political reform. No doubt the spread of knowledge is progressing rapidly throughout the land; but many years must necessarily clapse before the evils of mental slavery can be said to be non-existent, or before the free exercise of individual judgment is, in any sense, a reality; and until such time arrives it is clearly the duty of Government to protect, as far as possible, the uneducatee masses from the false and seditious doctrines of men who, whethed from lack of intelligence to grasp the true character of England'r work in this country, or from self-interested and spiteful motivess spare no pains to throw odium on the Government which has foster. spare no pains to throw odium on the Government which has loster, ed them and which in return they are now doing their unmost to embarrase. "If the Indian Government" as Sir Lepel Griffin very justly remarks in his article "India in 1895" which appeared in the April number of this Review, "be too timid to protect itself from open sedition and too ungenerous to defend its servants against false and malicious misrepresentation, it has surrendered one of the clementary principles of a civilized government, popular or autocra-tic, and deserves the fate which attends on all rulers who do not kuow how to govern.'

DEAR, dear I When you come to think of it how closely related things are ; how one thing brings up another. Ideas are like a lot of beads

A letter I have just been reading makes me remember what happen-A letter I have just been reading makes me remember what happended to me one winter about twenty years ago. The story is too long to tell here, so I'll merely give you the fail end of it. I was supercargo on a batk bound from Lundon to Rio. A tremendous gale, lasting five days, wrecked us. Furty-eight hours after it ceased there were four men and no more left on the vessel. The captain had been killed by a falling spar, three of the crew mashed overboard, and the rest of the shrb's company (save us four) went away to the long boat with the first and second mates. We were taking in water through a leak at the rate of six inches an hour. Waking with all our might the four of its could pump that out in forty minutes, but we must do it every hour. It was awful work. For two days we kept it inp, without sleep. Then we stopped, took to the quirter boat and showed off. The sea was quiet—no wind. While we lay to within a mile of her the ship threw up her notes and went down stern first. We were picked up the next day by a Damish brig.

Now the odo thoug is that the letter which reminded me of that experience has nothing whatever to say about ships. Please help me to

The lady who writes the letter says that in July, 1881, she got a bad fright. Exactly what it was she doesn't tell. I wish she did. Anyway it so upset her that she didn't get over the effects of it for nine years. After that her appetite fell off; she heat all real relish for food, and what she did ent only made trouble instead of nourishing her. It gave her pin in the pit of the stomach and (cuitonsly enough) between the shoulders. She says her eyes and skin presently turned yellow as a buttercap. Her face and abdomen swelled, and her feet the same, the latter so much su that she was obliged to have her shoes made larger. "I got little sleep at might," she says, "and was in so much pain I had to be propped up with pillows. For weeks together I could not he down in bed. I land a dry, hallow cough, and bad night swent. CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LINES TO THE EX-QUEEN OF THE FRENCH.

in act of true heroism should not pass unnoticed, in any age. The k-queen of the French, who, in spite of the errors and unpopularity fiber husband's government, has always preserved the respect of re French people, from her sincere piety and virtues, was, it is well mown, most adverse to her husband assuming the sceptre.

How is the case changed now! Her arm supported the tottering d man, after his abdication, to the carriage which was in attendance. To courage alone sustained him. This is well known; but it is not generally inderstood that she would have prevented his abdicating all, and, while others were giving the most fatal counsel, she alone left before the king with the heroic words, "C'est le devoir d'un ion amour parmi son peuple" Though not much of a poet, I have detivoired to fix public attention on a circumstance which I think serves uetther to be overlouked nor forgotten.

The scene to which I have made allusion, and which I have the best athority for believing to be founded strictly on fact, occurred on the aring of the 24th of February. So rapid and unforeseen was the ght of the royal family, that although they were assembled to take eir déjeuner λ la fourchette at the usual time, before an hour had ipsed not one of them was left in the Tuileries. Not only did the error remoistrate; it is stated that the officers in command were infident of the fidelity and homour of the army. Thus the weakness a moment may emperit the destinies of the world?

Gentlest of mothers! on that fatal day
When Orleans, still uncrowned, in bitter doubt
Was weakly yielding, thine was it to stay
Ambition's voice, and hinds the maddening shout
Of bad excitements; thine't was to shift out
All from thy hisband's breast but one small voice,
The voice of conscience and of truth; without Such aids, saidst thou, ill fortune guides thy choice.
Oh! had he hearken'd then, will might be now rejoice.

But 't was not so; for statecraft gained the day,
And she who now reposes in the grave*—
Peace to her ashes I—o'er thy lord held sway,
And men cried out, "Magnanimous and brave!"
The softer counsel which affection gave Unheeded past; and, haply, out of sight,
Thou shedd'st thy tears—all impotent to save,
But future witnesses, when known aright,
Of virtne's modesteways, which shun day's garish light.

Old ocean thus, in calm and placed mood, Is softest of imaginable things, In peaceful glory, by no zephyrs woo'd, Whereto, as to a mirror, nature brings

Bright forms, and there reflects the spreading wings
Of myriad argosies; there in his joy
The giddy schoolboy makes his minic rings—
Emblems, which still the poet may employ,
Of that vain glory which attain'd begins to cloy.

Yet can this self-same ocean, toss'd on high,
Be fierce and direful as devouring flame,
Raising his tunned billows to the sky,
And ibreatening he iven itself—the very frame
Of earth now yields—the floods their empire claim,
Is this the lake which but of late we knew Reposing sweetly, spiritless and tame,
Fair as a sleeping beauty—gentle too—
Which now its wiath so dire would give us cause to rue?

Noblest of greens! not altered less thy mien
In the last crisis of thy destiny,
When thou erect and firm alone wert seen,
Thy husband's stay, no tear upon thine eye!
Thou could'st the anger of the mob defy;
Age had not bowed thy spirit not thy heart;
For conscious virtue can on self rely.
When coward counsels spoke the word, "Depart,"
"T was thou, and thou alone, couldst act a herome's part,

Dastardly spirits! couldst thou say to those,
Even to thy children, kneeling round the throne,
Who tather timid wavering counsels chose
Than the proud conduct which was all thine own—
Better to die a monarch, and alone,
By treacherous friends deserted, than to fly!
Like Casar, thou the height of power hast known,
Dare then, like him, each traitor to defy,
And learn, like Casar too, with dignity to die.

Naples, fair land of luxury and ease !

Where pleasure dwells, and virtues stern decay,
Where the bright vineyards and the placid seas
Teach a degenerate race to while away
Their wanton hours, and waste the livelong day

Blithe self-sown children of the teening earth—
Oh! 'mid a race so thoughtless and so gay,
If test of excellence be moral worth,
France may well envy thee at least one heroine's birth

Campbell-Bamerman said:—

"In 1892 the country gave the Liberal Party a great mandate and the Liberal Government had striven up to the full measure of their streight to accomplish the task which was imposed upon them; but the means the country gave the Liberal Government in 1892 were not equal to the duty they put upon them. The lesson to be trawn from the history of the past three years was that become measures demand an heroic remedy. What had the Labour Party to do that they were content to play the part of jackal to the Fory hons? Did those gentlemen, who thought they had social deals that were superior to those of the Liberal Party, inhink that their ideals could be advanced by supporting the Tory policy? Lord Salisbury the other day scouted the whole range of political changes which the Liberal Party advocated, and asked the country to set them aside, and to follow hin into the mists of a nebulous social programme. He did not understand that the Labour Party objected to any one of these questions. He contended that it was the duty of the Labour Party, as it was aften Liberal Pirty, to protest against the monistrons assumption that it was Lord Salisbury and the Duke of Argyll, and the 500 men whom they led, who were to interpret the real feeling of the people. He appealed to them to do all in their power to put an end to this state of things once and for all."

On the 25th July, the Law Member introduced a Bill to exempt Crown Grants from the operation of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, with both retrospective and prospective effect. The additions to the Act proposed are:

"(1) Nothing in the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, contained shall apply or be deemed ever to have applied to any grant of transfer of Lind or of any intenses therein hereinfore made in hereafter to be made by or on behalf of the 1. ajecty the Queen-Empress, her heirs or successors, or by or on behalf of the Secretary of State for India in Council to, or in favour of, any person whomsover; but every such grant and transfer shall be construed and take effect as if the said Act had not been passed.

(2) All provisions, restrictions, conditions and limitations over con-

(2) All provisions, restrictions, conditions and limitations over contained in any such grant or transfer as aforesaid shall be valid and take effect according to their tenor, any rule of law in enactment of the Legislature in the contrary notwithstanding."

So Alexander Miller explained that by the Act limitations over in transfer of property to persons not born at the date of transfer are void, and that the question arose in connection with the Porabat Estate. He himself thinks are in the Government are not bound by the Act. That that opinion nearly he Pre rule, it is thought desirable to settle the question in the way proposed, specially as the Advocate-General of Bengal has expressed a different opinion. According to hing the Criwn has no power at common law to create an papartible and mahenable estate in land which has not hitherto by custom been impartible and inahenable. The Law Member will give the Crown that power, which, as he says, "it need not exercise except in any case in which it thinks proper." This easy view of absolute power is thoroughly un-English and opposed to modern levislation as against the spirit of the age. We may therefore expect a lively debate on the Bill. If Dr. Rashabehary Ghose is no longer in the Council to cry down the attempt in favour of perpetunies, a member may yet be found to stay the hand raised for arbitrary power. So Gottith Evans to the rescue !

THE fight over the Viceregal verand in his ended satisfactorily to both sides. The Municipal Commissioners met specially on Thursday, on a requisition from twelve of them, and ag eed to allow the three-storeved hanging structure. The matter had practically been decided on the previous Monday at the Lieutenant Governor's River Party on board the Rhotas. At the formal meeting the Chairman moved a resolution sauctioning the three-storyed verandah and reaffirming the rule disallowing covered versudalis, which resolution was carried, though several amendments were proposed and seconded. Thus the Viceroyalists, as a writer in the Statesman calls those who were for the verandah, gamed what they had contended for, and the Radicals who were dead against it, saved their minicipal conscience. These were afraid lest the sanction for the Viceregal verandah be quoted as a precedent for other verandiths. They therefore agreed to break the flue to allow what they could not resist, and simultaneously resoived that no covered veranding be allowed. The reaffirmation itself forms a precedent which those who are for such verandahs may point to bereafter. The Commissioners in meeting could not refuse the sanction. Public opinion had denounced their conduct of last week. The General Committee had sanctioned the structure, the Chairman had given permission to build and the stincture, was nearly ready. At this stage it was decided not to allow it. This order so late could not he practically given effect to $ For the Commissioners are bound by the action of the originary dan, Persineral Committee, the Chauman agreeing, and although the acc. not the General Committee caunot prevail against the order of the Commissioners in meeting, the Chairman could not withdraw the sunction already given but only carry nut the order so far as it was practicable. Such being the Liw, all unmannertness and exhibition of temper might have been saved, without compromise of any kind, by quietly passing over the matter.

The law was so altered to give more power to the Chairman and to leave the working of the minicipal law to the General Committee, which was also limited to a small number. This was the doing of Sir Henry Horrison. He was once pushed to a corner by the late Jadulal Mullick, when the late Chairman bod telegraphed a large order to England without waiting for the sanction of the Commissioners in meeting. Jadulal had opposed that item of business in the Town Council, the then General Committee, and had given notice of oppusing the sanction. He was prudent enough not to carry matters to extremes and did not move further. The law was, however, altered that the Chairman might be more free.

In the present discussion much stress has been laid on the interwhich it is sought to preserve inviolate as the work of Sir Heory Harrison. There was no greater stoner in this line than be. Sir Stewari Hogg had set his face against new haoging verticals and made a crusade against existing projections. With the advent of Sir Henry Harrison, veraid his began to hang in numbers, and they multiplied so fast that it was found access by to make a stern rule. Sn Henry was of the same opinion with Mr. Skime.

Mr. Skrine is paying dearly for his rashness. He had brought in a motion in the municipal hand to circumscribe the vapourings of its loquacious members. That project involved nothing less than disarming the Bengalee of his chief weapon. The Beng dee does not wield the sword, or any other instrument of aggression or defence. The only weapon with which he is most familiar is his supple toigne. To forbid him its use is cinelty. It is time, he has latterly taken to the pen. But that is no reason why he should not prize the much older weapon. Speaking of Dante, Sydney Smith remarking shat he might be a great poer, but as to inventing tortures, he tat of mere bungler. He displayed no imagination, no knowledge of the human heart. The Inferno is too full of contrivances for the infliction of mere physical tortures, but there is not much of mental torture m it. Chaffing his friend Macaulay, he said, "Oh, you should be dumb. False dates and facts of the reign of Queen Anne should for ever be shouted in your ears; all liberal and honest opinions should be rediculed in your presence; and you should not be able to say a single word during that period in their defence." Surely, the condemnation of Macaulay to shence under such cheumstances would have been a torture exquisite in its cruelty. But even such torture would be nothing compared to Mr. Skrine's closure in the municipality. Mr. Skime is circlited with thuroughly understanding the Bengalee. It would seem that he has yet to learn. Our patriots are many of them verbal hydrants. They derive their principal sustenance from-words, words, words. Words are their chief pabulum. They live upon them and by them. To deprive them of the use of words would be to rob them of their life-breath.

IF Mr. Skine is the butt of redicale of the patriots in the Corporation, the Chanman too seems to have thrown him overboard. When questioned by one of the Commissioners whether he had heard Mr. Skime use offensive language to him at a previous meeting and what steps he intended to take to punish Mr. Skime, Mr. Ritchie replied that he had heard certain imparliamentary words, but what they were he could not catch, and, without calling on Mr. Skrine to explain or to apologize, ruled that he could not take any notice of an incident occurring at a previous inceting. The ruling may be a salutary one. For the moment it acted as a balm or avoided further exhibition of temper. But does the matter end there? Has it received its quietus? We wish it had It does not appear, though, that the Chairman had considered all possibilities. In burying an nupleasantness, he leaves a loophole for its escape. He begins by a mistake. In laying down his law, the Chairman breaks it himself. It is of the name of the Compromise Resolution regarding the Viceregal verandah. He would not allow the taking up of an impleasant incident of a previous meeting. In the same breath, he condemns unheard a colleague for certain unembodied sounds which had reached to mosts at a past sitting of the Commissioners with 6

THE last week witnessed two celebrations in honour of Pandit Vidyasagar. One of these took place at the Emerchi Theatre, in connection with the Vidyasagar Library, and the other at the Star Fleatre. In the former, Babu Rabinda i Nath Tagore read a discourse on the character and doings of the deceased Prince of Pandits. The meeting at the Star was presided over by Dr. Rishbeliary Ghose. The speakers, besides the chairman, were Babus Hirandra Nath Duit, Hem Chandra Roy, Chandi Charan Banerjee, and Amundal Bose. The last two addressed the audience in Bengali. Babu Amritalal, as usual, was very entertaining.

THE Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science held its annual meeting on Toesday. Sir Charles Elliott presided. The I gallery was full with members, students and others, mostly Native.

Some half a dozen European gentlemen and one European lady were present. The New Indian Woman, like the Maharajas, was conspicuous by her absence. Dr. Sacar opened the proceedings by reading the report which could not be presented earlier on account of his had health. Altogether 79 lectures were delivered during the year 1894, exclusive of to practical demonstrations. The session of 1894-95 was opened by Father Lafont with an introductory lecture. A new section, that of Biology, was opened, with an inaugural discourse, by the Honorary Secretary, followed with 5 lectures by Mr. Banwarilal Chaudhmi, B.A., BSc, and 3 by Dr Nihatin Sukar The audited accounts of the Association at the close of last year show a balance of Rs. 1,23,116-10 against Rs. 1,17,972-6 11 of the previous year. The reading of the report over, the Secretary made, as usual, an earnest appeal for more funds. In the fervour of eloquence and the need of more money for an institution to which he has devoted his whole life and energies, he unearthed the buried controversy at its birth, and after think lapse of two decades denounced the Temple of Science, characterized as an opposition shop to his own. He deplote, its bith as a check to this day to the flow of money to his own. But he forgot that he had refused to incorporate that insti-Intion with his own which would have made it more flourishing. Dr. Sircar has lived to be disabused of many of his impressions since the conception of his Temple of Science, and may be live longer still to know that that opposition, if it was an opposition, generated more energy in himself and the friends who had sided with him. His institution had experienced apposition from within itself-The incident alluded to by the Secretary was elaborated upon by the Vice-President Father Lifont, but not sufficiently enough to be intelligible to all present. He only indulged his spleen on the devoted head of another reverend gentlem in, now no more, who professed a different creed and held a different view. He was equally unhappy in explaining why he gave up lecturing at the Association. He could not have rendered a greater disservice to the cause for which he spoke that evening. Dr Sircar's appeal was also for further aid from Government. He wished for a special recognition of the Science Association, Sir Charles Elliant replied to the points raised in the address and took the audience into his confidence by relating some of the measures taken by himself and his Government in the cause of science. We hage no space for the reply this week.

THE PILGRIM SHIPS BILL.

A BLIND LEGISLATION.

THE Pilgrim Ships Bill now before the Select Committee is an important measure, affecting as it does Mahomedans throughout India, particularly the middle and lower classes who form the bulk of pilgruns. It is a measure also in the right direction. But the haste with which it is being rushed through Council has caused alarm among the ignorant, is report apology for it offered by the member in charge, the Bill is unsatisfactory and worse than the original sin, as the Persian proverb says. There has been no public preparation for such a drastic measure. Even now the papers relating to the subject are known only to the select circle. All that is known of them is what the member in charge of the Bill has been pleased to publish. We must con-fess that Sit Alexander Mackenzie is more outspoken than Sir Alexander Miller usually is. The Representations on the subject will be received or fancied, upsets them completely. through Local Governments only up to the 15th Whatever the rigour of the law, the Indian that the measure be passed before the next Haj The heavy restrictions will defeat their own season. The Government of India has, therefore, no choice in the matter, and the law must come into force on the 1st October.

The Mahomedan community is grateful to Government for the interest taken and anxiety shown for the Mecca pilgrims. It has not only devised measures and obtained concessions from the Sultan for the comfort and welfare of its subjects, but spent a large sum of money for better accommodation in pilgrim vessels. After all that Government has done for the Mahomedons, it is surprising that it should not have safeguarded their interest in the International Sanitary Conference held at Paris in 1894, and would neglect to be properly represented in the Couninportance to 57,000,000 raddions of Her Majestey's subjects. This it affective, or whatever it be, has filled the minds of Ind in Mahomedans with consternation, and they are exceedingly grieved that they are to be guided in the performance of their religious rites and ceremonies by the combined wisdom of European Continental Powers. Although Asia is reputed to be the original home of cholera, the Government of India believes that any epidemic of the disease in Europe, when it has travelled from outside, has done so by land by way of Russia, there being no evidence that it came from India by sea. In that belief, it declined to attend the Dresden Convention of 1893 called to concert measures against the invasion by cholera of Europe, for it would not be a party to imposition of objectionable obligations upon the local, and especially the maritine, Governments of this country.

Notwithstanding, the Bill is introduced, which, when passed, it is feared, will practically close the Haj to the poorer classes, to whom no religious obligation is so dear as a pilgrimage to Mecca. To-day restrictions are put on the pilgrimage to satisfy a foreign demand based on no other substantial reason than the fear of a dreaded disease. Who knows that to-morrow the demand will not be repeated in a graver form? Will the Government of India be prepared then to end the Haj entirely. From the way in which it is now proceeding, it will be equally prepared to pass another Bill in three or four weeks, at Simla, without allowing any opportunity for representation. Such quick legislation in the interest of Foreign Governments, the necessity whereof is not acknowledged by our Government, cannot confirm the faith of our people in its wisdom or good intentions. The present Bill so religiously affecting the Mahomedans is being considered in Select Committee without a Mahomedan being on. Nor is it possible to give every possible companion to a measure of such magnitude within such a short time. We do not say that Government should not pass any measure which it thinks proper. The educated Musalmans, we are sure, believe that Government has been actuated by the best of motives, although under pressure from outside. But of what good those intentions if the result be disastrous? The political effect also cannot but be injurious. It will be difficult to remove from the minds of illiterate Bill was introduced on the 14th July, published at millions the wrong impression which the Bill has Simla on the 13th and referred to the Select begun to create. Mahomedans are very sensitive Committee on the 25th of the same month, about their religion, and the least interference, real regions, or rather I should sav, to regions which existed only in the imagination of the projectors. The rival scheme could not, in the nature of things, be long-lived. Indeed, it died as soon it was born. But the mischief done by those who helped it at its birth has been disastrously permanent. The popular mind, not over informed anywhere, and grossly ignorant in mind, not over informed anywhere, and grossly ignorant in this country, has not yet recovered from the spell which the sound of the word 'practical' bound it twenty years ago.

The fact remains that though the Association was established with the express intention of paying its workers from month-ly subscriptions, the painful discovery was soon made, as was apprehended by Babu Keshab Chunder Sen, that the necessary apprendiction of Section Continues Sen, that the hecessary sum could not be got on paper, far less realized. The Association has accordingly been depending upon honourary lecturers from the very beginning. And it is only since 1892 that we have been able to pay some remuneration to our lecturer on chemistry, though, as already said, not adequate enough to command his entire time.

It was not till the most pressing requirement of the Asso-ciation, the building of a lecture hall was met, that we could venture to speak of the endowment of professorships, as another of our pressing requirements, without which indeed the permanency of the Institution could not be assured. Accordingly on the day Lord Ripon laid the foundation-stone of the lecture hall, I made my appeal for funds for the endowment of professorships.
"The present lecturers," said I, "are rendering their services gratuitously, out of pure love of science, and out of regard for the gratutiously, out of pure love of science, and out of regard for the alvancement of the natives of this country, but they cannot continue to render those services for ever. And neither can we expect, nor ought we to expect, that we should always be able to command honourary lecturers. This is neither possible nor desirable. We must have men continually at work, observing and experimenting and investigating, within the walls of the Institution, in fact, devoting their lives to the cultivation of science in order that we may have natives of the country contributing to the advancement of human knowledge, for which specific to the advancement of human knowledge, for which specific object this Institution was projected and has been established."

Two years later, in 1884, when the lecture hall was inaugurated by the same Viceroy, I once more urged the necessity of endowed professorships, and a fund for one professorship was actually started. His Excellency not only gave us permission to call it after him, but gave us a substantial donation of Rs. 1000 in its aid. H. H. Sivaji Rao Holkar, then first Prince of Rs. 1000 in w Maharaja, gave us permission to divert his donation of Rs. 1000, to this fund. With characteristic liberality H. H. the Maharaja of Durbhanga subscribed Rs. 10,000 in aid of the same fund. But sad to say, after the departure of Lord Ripon, at least, this has been the coincidence, the fund has improved but little, notwithstanding our repeated appeals in its aid. After 1886 it has come to an absolute stand still, a fact which so much surprized Sir Steuart Bayley that in addressing the members and assembled guests at the annual meeting in 1888, he was compelled to put the question, "In this wealthy city is Lord Ripon's name then forgotten?" and instead of waiting for a reply added, "but I would rather leave you to draw the moral, and content myself with reminding you of what Lord Ripon himself said that 'a single school founded, a single college aided, may, a single scholarship provided, will do, in the times which are before us, more to uphold the honour of an ancient name or to create the reputation of a new one, than any outward name or to create the reputation of a new one, than any outward show of dignity or any personal display of wealth."

The Committee of Management, after having year after year regretted inability to report any improvement in the fund, have for very shame abatained from even alluding to it.

But the importance of a professorship endowment fund, especially when coupled with the name of a most popular Viceroy, is so great that I cannot let slip this opportune and I might say this auspicious occasion without bringing it prominently forward once more to the notice of my countrymen, Hindu, Mahomedan, Parsi, and all who take pride in the name Indian.

I have called this occasion opportune and auspicious, because we have the privilege of holding this meeting under the presidency of a ruler who has evinced genuine earnestness in the cause of science by substantial encouragement, not encouragement by word of mouth only, but by the actual endowment of a prize for original research in the adjudication of which an honourable place has been given to this Institution. Considering the occasion then, may I not hope that those of my countrymen present here will enable me to announce at the next annual meeting that the Ripon professorship has become an accomplished fact?

nas become an accompished tact?

I may be permitted to point out that the failure to found a professorship in the name of Lord Ripon would be a serious reflection upon our gratitude and our sincerity. The enthusiasm that was displayed in honour of his lordship throughout the length and breath of India was phenomenal at the time. Was that enthusiasm sincery mich. bleadth of India was phenomena; at the thick as the constant as a sincere? might well be asked when we have literally done nothing to perpetuate his memory. If it was sincere, how is it that our gratitude followed suit with the smoke of the fireworks with which his lordship was entertained at Belgatchia, that is to say, evaporated and did not settle down into something solid and substantial? And what thing more solid and substantial could possibly be imagined than what we are now speaking about, which would not simply be a token of our sincerity and of our granitude but would benefit us without measure and for ever?

But, Sir, it is not in aid of the endowment of this one professorship, however important to endow for the sake of our national character, that want your powerful voice. Those who have even the most superficial knowledge of what and how the havious of the West are doing for the cultivation of the sciences bught to know what number of professorships we require for an Institute of Science which professes to be, and deserves to be, and may be made to be, a national Indian Institution.

First in the field to awaken the people of India to the necessity of the cultivation of the physical sciences as the best and indeed the only method by which they can be essentially improved, by which the Asiatic torpor of ages can be shaken off, by which the lost prestige of the Indian sages as the educators of the world in primeral times, can be regained, ---would it not be a pity if such an Institution were to languish for want of support? And would it not be a greater pity still if after having advanced as far it has done, it is suffered to die of inantition, or worse, to dwindle into a sorry and miserable thing for ever bearing witness to the want of energy and enlightenment of the present Indian people?

Now what is the alvance which the Association has made during the twenty years it has been in working existence? This is not altogether inconsiderable if it is borne in mind, that it has been in Hoperfect inconsistance in the content many that is not a second of Rs. 1,92,338 as donation, including the R 25,000 of Baba Kili Kissen Tagore for instruments and the R 42,000 of Maharaja of Vizianagram for the laboratory building, and Rs 20, 000 as monthly and yearly subscriptions. By judicion mas in it of this sum the Association has made an income of Rs. 61,000 in the shape of interest from Government securities and Rs. 20,000 as tent from the road-side shops. It has altogether spent Rs. 1,80,000 of which the sum of Rs. 31,000 was spent in the purchase of the premises on which it stands, Rs. 30,000 in building the lecture hall, Rs. 41,000 in building the laboratory, about Rs. 36,000 in nail, Rs. 41,000 in Dullding the laboratory, about Rs. 30,000 in the purchase of instruments, about Rs. 3,000 in Surinture and Rs. 2,000 in books and periodicals, and nearly Rs. 8,000 in municipal taxes, and the balance of Rs. 28,000 in establishment, charges general, lecture charges, lighting, &c. As regards the number of lectures delivered, in place of two in the month with which the work-of the Association was begun, there are now six a week or twenty-four in the month during the working session.

"We must therefore gratefully admit" with the Hinde Patriot "that Bengal, and especially the Metropolis, has done much for the cause of science. But it must be equally admitted that much more that could have been done has not been done. We see only the names of a few millionaires on the subscription list, and it is their names which recur on different occasions. How many there are who can come forward very liberally, but have not done so? What more convincing proof do they require of the utility and the im-How many there are What portance of the Association than the testimony, in eloquent, carnest and often impassioned words, borne of that utility and importance. by successive Victroys who have been its patrons, and by successive Licutenant-Govenors who have been its presidents?"

"But it is not our millionanes alone," continues the same journal,
"who are to blame for their apathy and indifference to the cause of the Science Association. The institution has not met with that appreciation from the bulk of our community which it was expected in the beginning that it would. This means the apathy and in-difference of the educated classes, who are and ought to be the pro-per representatives of the country. Education has not, it is true, reached the masses. But what increasing numbers of graduates are being turned out year after year by our universities. To them the ntages of science-cultivation to this country cannot be matter of doubt. And yet we do not see that they have moved on the matter adequately to their numbers and their culture. We do not see that they have come forward either with their purse or with other help at their easy command. We do not mean to say that there are not honourable exceptions, but how lew, how solitary these excep tions are! We do not exaggerate when we say that we have scarcely found a single graduate who has tried to persuade others to help the institution. If our graduates had shown any earnestness in the matter, and acted the part of the missionary in the cause of science, the Association would have worn a different and brighter aspect. The rules of membership have placed it within reach of every one with moderate income."

I think I have made clear what is expected from my country from the wealthy and the learned, as regrds this institution. I will here quote an important observation which was made by the Hon'ble Mr. Cotton in his address on Technical Education at the Bethune Society some years ago, which has a most pertinent bearing on what I have been so feeby urging. "A most urgent need to india," said he, "is the better disposition of hoarded wealth. India is in need of wealthy men who have wisdom and experience, who will not fritter away their money on tamuba and ceremonies, and who are not unwilling to lay out capital which will bring them neither titles nor official similes. We do not want capital to he buried, we do not want it to be wasted on marriage expenses, nor do we want it to be squandered in sycophantic subscriptions or in the reception and entertainment of officials. Some expenditure of this kind will al-Some expenditure of this kind will always be unavoidable, but the waste which now runs rampant must be checked. No spectacle is more deplorable in the eyes of the well-wishers of this country than the lavish squandering outlay which fashions demands and public opinion sauctions on these occasions." I have only to remark in this connection that we have two kinds of hoarded wealth in this country, one in the shape of hoarded gold and silver and the other in the shape of unused mielhgence. In order to liberate the latter it is necessary to liberate the former, which in this sublunar world of ours is a magic transformer of energy of all kinds.

And now, before I resume my seat, a word as to what I expect, and may legitimately expect, from Gavernment. Lord Lytton, when he paid a visit to the Association in 1880 to be present at one of its lectures, in addressing the audience after the lecture, sail, "and let me beg you to remember that the cause of science here in India is really of all causes the most descriving, the most beneficent, and the most charitable." Lord Ripon marked "the deep and sincere interest he felt in the progress of the Association—an interest which," his Lordship said, "increased with his increasing acquaintance with the wants of India," by contributing liberally to its funds. Lord Lansdowne, also a contibuting liberally to its funds. Lord Lansdowne, also a contributor to its funds, when laving the foundation-stone of the Vizianagram laboratory, said, "I am convinced of the great value of the work which the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science has done in the past, and is likely to do in the future," And now, before I resume my seat, a word as to what I Science has done in the past, and is likely to do in the future," and added, "I shall be expressing the general opinion of those who stand around me when I say that, living as we are in an age remarkable for the number and brilliancy of its scientific dis-coveries---an age in which every civilized nation is contributing its quota towards the general fund of scientific knowledge---we should be reductant to think that India, considering the intelligence of many of the races by which it is inhabited, should fail to bear its share in extending the dominion of man over the natural world."

I need not here recount what your predecessors in the presidential chair said and did for the Association. Your Honor has gone further them all when in presiding at our annual meeting in 1891, you were pleased to abserve --- It is quite right that Government should support and encourage everything that is done to promote the growth of the love of science in India. It is these words which have emboldened me to say my humble say, as I am now doing, as to what we may expect from our Government. We are thankful for what the Government has already done for the Association by its moral support, and by acquiring the land on which its premises stand.

But it can do much more in a variety of other ways without any appreciable charge upon its finances. For instance, it can turnish the institution with instruments made at its workshops for us meteorological, mathematical, telegraphic and other departments, at little or no cost. It can supply it with spare speciments from its geological and other miseums. And it can order copies of all its scientific publications to be sent for the library of the institution.

There is one other thing which I hambly beg to suggest Government can easily do, and which is calculated to benefit the Association immensely by drawing students to its lectures and practical demonstrations, and that is by passing some such resolution this -- that candidates for Government service requiring a know ledge of science will have preference if they can show certificates of having passed through full courses of instruction at the Science Association. While this will be a very great encouragement to students, it will be a gain to Government to have men under its strates with a better knowledge of their work than would other wise be attainable. It has become a fashion to reproach the Indian student for nor taking to the study of science for the love of science, as if even in the most civilized countries which owe their ensilization to science, the raw unfledged student prosecutes scientific studies with expectation of neither immediate nor prospective advantages. It is, as I have often said, a note-worthy though sad fact that earnest students are seldom found amongst those who are born and bred up in the lap of luxury and case; all the world over, and specially in our own country, they are met with chirdly among the poor. It is the duty of every lover of true with chiefly among the poor. It is the duty of every lover of true worth and of the State to find out genuine talent from its home in adversity.

And now, Honourable Sir and Gentlemen, I have done. I feel that in this great matter I have not been able to do my duty with any satisfaction to myself. Having had to satisfy the demands of the stomach by my professional work, I had not leisure enough left to stomach by my professional work, I had not leisure enough left to devote to the adequate fulfilment of the rask I had set before myself. I think I ought to admit that it is chiefly to this cause that the progress made by the Association in twenty years has been so small compared with what has been done in the West during that time as scarcely to lead to any hopeful prospect. If I am still persevering, it is because I have faith in the inherent capacity of my countrymen to explore the secrets of nature, it is because I have faith in the beneficence of our Government, and above all, it is because I have faith in the providence of God.

My countrymen, you have but to will it, you have only to pro-perly use your hoarded wealth and hoarded intelligence, and it will not be long before you take your place among the favoured nations of the world. Do you want any recent example to encourage you and inspire you with confidence? Look at Japan, only a few years ago perhaps the most insignificant country in Asia. And yet see what science has done for her. Why should you despair when you are backed by a most glorious past and can rely upon an inherited intelligence not inferior to any other in the whole world? How is it that the spirit of your sages does not animate you, sages who set before man the loftiest ideals of excellence, truth for the intellect and absolute disinterestedness for the heart? I leave you to ponder over these questions and to find what answer you can.

ONLY FOUR TO MAN THE PUMPS.

DEAR, dear ! When you come to think of it how closely related things ings up another. Ideas are like a lot of beads

DEAR, dear? I when you come to fining of it now closely related things on a string, aren't they?

A letter I have just been reading makes me remember what happened to me one winter about twenty years ago. The story is too long to tell here, so I'll interely give you the tail end of ii. I was supercargo on a bank bound from London to Rio. A tremendous gale, lasting five days, wiecked us. Forty eight hours after it ceased there were four men and no more left on the vessel. The captain had been killed by a falling spar, three of the crew washed overboard, and the rest of the shro's company (save in four) went away in the long boat with the first and second maters. We were taking in water through a leak at the late of six incises an hour. Working with all our night the four of its could pump that out in forty minutes, but we mist do it every hour. It was awful work. For two days we kept it up, without sleep. Then we stopped, took to the quarter boat and shoved off. The sea was quiett—no wind. While we lay to within a mile of her the ship threw up her mose and went down stern first. We were picked up the next day by a Danish bing.

Now the add iting is that the letter which reminded me of that experience has nothing whatever to say about ships. Please help me to find out the association.

The lady who writes the letter says that in July, 1881, she got a bad teach.

perience has nothing whatever to say about ships. Please help me to find out the assuctation.

The lady who writes the letter says that in July, 1881, she got a bad fright. Exactly what it was she doesn't tell. I wish she did. Anyway it so upset he that she didn't get over the effects of it for nine year. After that her appetite fell off; she lost all real relish for foud, and what she dule at only made trouble instead of nonrishing her. It gave her pain in the pix of the stomach and (curiously enough) between the shoulders. She says her eyes and skin presently turned yellow as a butterrop. Her face and abdomen swelled, and her feet the same, the latter so much so that she was obliged to have her shoes made larger. "I got inthe sleep at night," she says, " and was in so much pain I had to be propped up with pillows. For weeks together I could not lie down in bed. I had a dry, hollow cough, and bad night sweats. Then dainbea set in, and my bowels became infectated. I was often in dieadful agony for forty-right hours at a time. Then I would have a chill as though a bucket of cold water were puoned down my back. I got so low I could no longer sew, knit, or do any lionisework or look after my children. My sister hid to come and help in the liouse. "Everybody said I was in a decline and must die. What I suffered for eight years tongue cannot tell. The doctor could do nothing for me. He said my complaint was computated and bad to deal with in 1886 I went as an outdoor patient to the Shewsbuy Infirmary, but only got transfert tellet."

The witter is in good health now, but why did her case remand me

In 1886 I went as an outdoor patient to the Sinewsoury internacy, our only got transfert relief."

The writer is in good health now, but why did her case remond me of the simpwick? Let's settle that first. The association is easy and natural. Just see. The slop sank because we form new hado't the strength to pump out the water as fast as it came in. Twenty might have got her into poit. It is the last straw that line its came's back; the last unsupplied need that makes poverty abject as desperate.

These hodies of ones carry the seeds of disease with them all the These hodies of onis carry the seeds of disease with them all the time—chirdy the poissons created by injective digestion, made waise by careless habits. But as long as nothing extraordismy happens we manage to scrape along in a half-ind half sort of fashion. Yet we've got in our blood the sind that any of a dozen diseases is made of, only waiting for something to set it after. While the liver, kidneys, longs and skin keep in fairly free—that is, don't let the load get too heavy—we say, "Oh, yes, I'm tolerably well, thank you." Little p into and impleasant symptoms bother us now and then, but we don't fairly they mean anything.

By-and-by something happens. A cold, too hearty a meal, a might of dissipation, an affliction through death or loss of property, a fight

By-and-by someting nappens. A cond not nearly a meal, a light of dissipation, an affiction through death or loss of property, a flight as in Mrs. Bunce's case, &c. Over we go. The last straw has crushed us. One losse spirk has olown up the barrel of powder. The crew is too small to save the ship. The kidneys, here, skin, and stomach strike work, and we must have help right away or perish. All of which means the explosion of latent indigestion and dyspepsia pottons in the short blood.

There I sm't it plant why I thought of the ship? Now for the conclusion of the lady's story. She says: "In 1889 I first beaut of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. Half a bottle made me feel better, and by keeping on taking it I was soon's trong and well as ever. (Signed) Mis. Ann Bunce, The Park, Worthen, near Shrewsbury, February 22nd, 1892 in 1892 i

It there were only a way to save sinking ships as certain and trust-worthy as Mother Seigel's medicine is in the case of sinking human bodies, what a blessing it would be to poor sailors.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1895.

WHOLE NO 687.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO THE STETHOSCOPE.

" Tuba mirum spargens sonom." - Dies Ira.

Stethoscope! thou simple tube, Clarion of the yawning tomb, Unto me thou seem'st to be A very trump of doom.

Wielding thee, the grave physician
By the trembling patient stands,
L ke some defity skilled musician.
Strange! the trumper in his bands.
Whilst the sufferer's eyeball ghistens
Full of hope and full of fear,
Quietly he bends and listens
With his quick, accustomed ear—
Waiteth until thou shalt tell Tidings of the war within
In the battle and the strife,
Is it death, or is it life,
That the fought-for prize shall win.

Then thou whisperest in his ear
Words which only he can hear—
Words of woe and words of cheei
Jubilatés thou hast sounded,
Wild exulting songs of gladness.
Misererés have abounded
Of unutterable sadness.
Sometimes may thy tones impart,
Comfort to the sad at heart,
Oftener when thy his have spoken,
Eyes have wept, and hearts have broken

Calm and grave physician, thon
Art like a crownfd King;
Though there is not round thy brow
A bamble golden ring,
As a Czar of many lands,
Life and death are in thy hands
Sceptie-like, that Stethoscope
Seemeth in thy hands to wave.
As it points, thy subject goeth
Downwards to the silent grave;
Or thy lengly power to save
Lifts him from a bed of pain,
Breaks his weary bond ige-chain,
And but, him be a man again.

Like a Priest beside the altar
Bleeding victims sacrificing,
Thou dost stand, and dost not falter
Whatso'er their agonizing

Death lifts up his dooming finger, And the Flamen may not linger l Prophet art thon, wise physician, Down the future calmly gazing, Heeding not the strange amazing Features of the ghastly vision. Float around thee shadowy crowds, Living shapes in coming shrouds ;-Brides with babes, in dark graves sleeping That still sleep which knows no waking ; Eyes all bright, grown dim with weeping , Hearts all joy, with anguish breaking; Stalwart men to dust degraded; Maiden charms by worms invaded; Cradle songs as funeral hymns; Mould'ring bones for hving limbs ; Stately looks and angel faces. Loving smiles, and winning graces, Turned to skulls with dead grimaces. All the future, like a scroll, Opening out, that it may show, Like the ancient prophet's roll, Mourning, lamentation, auguish, (mef, and every form of woe

On a couch with kind gifts laden, Flowers around her, books beside her, Knowing not what shall betide her, Languishes a gentle maiden. Cold and glassy is her bright eye, Hectic red her hollow cheek, Tangled the neglected ringlets. Wan the body, thin and weak ; Like thick cords, the swelling blue veins Shine through the transparent skin, Day by day some fiercer new pains Vex without, or war within Yet she counts it but a passing. Transient, accidental thing , Were the summer only here, It would healing bring ! And with many a fond deceit Tries she thus her fears to cheat :

"When the cowslip's early bloom Quite hath lost its rich perfume; When the violet's fragrant breath Tasted have the lips of death : When the snowdrop long hath died, And the primrose at its side In its grave is sleeping; When the lilies all are over, And amongst the scented clover Merry lambs are leaping; When the swallow's voice is ringing Through the echoing azure dome, Saying, ' From my far-off home I have come, my wild way winging O'er the waves, that I might tell, As of old, I love ye well. Hark ! I sound my silver bell ; All my happy birds are singing From each throat

A merry note,

Welcome to my coming bringing?

When that happy time shall be,

From all pain and anguish free,

I shall join you, full of life and full of glee?

Then, thou fearful Stethoscope ! Thon dost seem thy lips to ope, Saying, " Bid farewell to hope I foretell thee days of gloom, I pronounce thy note of doom-Make thee ready for the tomb ! Cease thy weeping, fears avail not , Fray to God thy courage fail not He who knoweth no repenting, Sympathy or sad relenting, Will not heed thy sore lamenting-Death, who soon will be thy guide To his couch, will hold thee fast , As a lover at thy side Will be with you to the last, Longing for thy latest gasp, When within his iron grasp As his bride he will thee clasp "

Shifts the scene. The earth is sleeping.
With her weary eyelids closed,
Hushed by darkness into slumber.
Whilst in burning ranks disposed,
High above, in countless number.
All the heavens in radiance sleeping,
Watch and ward
And loving guard.
O'er her rest the stars are keeping.

Often has the turret chime
Of the hasty flight of time
Warning interance given.
And the stars are growing dim
On the gray houzon's rim,
In the dawning light of heaven.
But there sits, the Bear ont-turing
As if no repose requiring,
One pile youth, all unattending
To the hour, with bright eye bending
O'er the loved and honoured pages,
Where are writ the words of sages,
And the heroic deeds and and thoughts of far distant ages

THE University of Gottingen admits ladies to its degrees as "special exceptions." But these exceptions are about to form the rule. The second of such admissions is that of Miss Maltby, an American, closely following the heels of Miss Chisholm, to the degree of doctor of philosophy with the distinction "cum laude" and a special commendation of her written work. There are now twenty women preparing at that University for their examinations.

THE Council of the Legion of Honour having refused to strike out the name of M. Effel, the French Chainber resolved upon a $B_{1,1}$ for the re-organization of the Council. The Council have since unanimously decided to resign.

ACCORDING to a recent report the number of women and guls returned as occupied out of every 1,000 in England and Wiles was 3405 in 1881 and 3442 in 1891, giving an increase of nearly four per thousand. In the United States the increase has been 7e markable. We give some examples:—

In England there are no lady elergymen, nor dentists, nor Government officials.

LORD Rosebery contradicted the statement that he had created four new Peers in consideration of their having given 1,00,000/ to the war chest of the Radical Party at the recent election. His Secretary writes to a correspondent.

"Of the four Peers created the two wealthy ones were promised the Peerage by Mr. Gladstone in 1892, when Lord Rosehey had nothing to do with matters of that kind; and therefore they certainly do not receive the homour for coming to the assistance of the Libetal war chest on the present occasion. Of the other two Peers, who were recommended by Land Rosehery on his som's exparate responsibility, one is a distinguished servant of the Crown, but, as Lord Rosebery helieves, not a Liberal in politics; and the other is a Liberal in politics who has served in the Government, but who is certainly not in a position to give large contributions, if any, to party purposes."

"A LIBERAL, though a Unionist," "having written to the Duke of Devoushire, pointing out that certain recent proceedings appeared to indicate a premature endeavour to force the alliance sato a fusion where the name of Liberal might be merged or lost, his Grace has replied as follows:

"I think that I may be best able to reply to your letter by referring you to the speech which I unde on June 15 at the banger of the Mittonal Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations, in which I entered rates fully into the question of the relations nerveen the Conservative and Linead Unionist parties. It may be gathered from my observations on that occasion that while I perhaps attach less importance than its attributed by others to the distinction between allocate and fusion, I pointed out in the strongest terms that the avowed opinions of many of us prevented us from ever adopting the manes of Conservative on Tory, with all the associations which attach to them. While the Home Rule question exists I would gladly see Unionists of all sections adopting that mane in preference to any other designation, must continue to consist of Conservatives and of Liberal Unionist Party most continue to consist of Conservatives and of Liberal Unionist Party four independent existence has been recognised in the clearest manner in the formation of the prevent G-venionent; the preparations for the general election in the Unionist uncerest have been made, and it is now being conducted, with complete harmony, by our independent organisations, and there is not, so far as I am aware, the slightest desire on opponents, to put an end to the existence of either of the independent parties whose close allinice has, up to the present time, been attended by such remarkable success."

OUR Monghyr (Jamalpur) correspondent writes .-

Preparations are making for the reception of the Lieutenant Governor, who is expected at Monghyr on the 11th.

Two natives of Behar are alleged to have been but ally murdered in Monghyr and Rampur, a village in Jamalpur, respectively. Two men are under arrest. Another suspicious death of a native is reputted here. The dead body has been removed to the Monghyr Government Hospital for post mortem examination.

The local immorphing is now devoting itself to the sanitary improvement of the unitive quarters. In Nowagong Bordyapara some filed houses have already been demalished, and lands having been acquired, a new wide road has been made, while others are in contemplation with additional improvements. It is also proposed to have water-works. It is intended to bore the foot of the hills forming the Eastern houndary of Janualpur till a perpetual spring is reached, whence the water will be conveyed through pipes to the town.

The Rhootta crap is abundant. The chimate may be said to be pretty fair, notwithstanding some isolated cases of cholera.

MR. H. M. Kisch having been granted privilege leave for two months and thirty-days, Mr. W J. Hain, officiating Post Master General, Madras, will officiate as Post Master General, Bengal.

MORE than one attempt was made in Calcutta to tax bicycles, but failed. Madras is more advanced. We read that Dr. W. H. Wilson, Professor of Chemistry, Madras Presidency College, appealed to the Presidency Magistrates, Egmore, against the taxation of his bocycle by the municipality. The Court held that a bicycle is a vehicle with springs and taxable under the Municipal Act.

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS

CHINA is again to the fore. Not as the receding Power before the advancing Japan, but for another bloody deed—the massacre of foreigners. A report reached Shanghai from Foochow of slaughter of Christians at Kuchang, including five foreign ladies. The next information from Foochow was that ten British subjects were killed at Kuchang, and that the bouses of the foreigners were set fire to. The Rev. Mr. Stewart, his wife and child were burnt, and seven unmarried women were killed with swords. The American residents escaped. It was also immoured that the victims were subjected to shocking attouties. The sectaries of the Vegetarian Society set fire to the houses of the foreign residents. The remains of the Kuchung victims have been buried at Foochow. Indignation meetings have been buried at Foochow.

the foreign colonists at Foochow, Hongkong, and Shanghai, demanding protection from their respective Governments and punishment of the omdeters. End Sabsbury next demanded from China a decree ordering the death of the culpies in the Kuchang massaire, and the fullest protection for inestinaires; also that an escort be provided for the British Consul who is going to Kuchang to enquire into the massacre. A reply has been received from China assenting to the demands. The position of the Europeans at Foochow is regarded as critical, owing to the hostility shown to foreigners. The province of Fukien is in a state of rebellion. Several guidouts have been ordered to Foochow to protect the foreign settlement.

The latest advices from China state that the Chinese soldiers sent to protect the Mission at Kuchung broke into the place and plundered it.

Renter's correspondent at Hongkong telegraphs that an infuriated mob attacked, on Aug. 7, the British and American Missions at Fatshan, near Canton. Hospitals were demolished and other damage was done. Some of the Missionaries saved themselves by flight. A Chinese guibboat has been despitched to the scene to quell the disturbance and restore order. The anti-foreign ngitators propose to destroy all the Missionaries to the treaty ports. The sectures of the Vegetarian Society now number towelve thousand and are well armed and organised, and able to withstand the Chinese troops.

His Excellency King Tajen, Chinese Minister in London, had a protracted authence with Lord Salisbury on Thursday. A meeting of the Cabinet was held immediately after to discuss the Chinese massactes.

THE Porte's reply to the demands made by the ambassanders in regard to Armenia is deemed unsatisfactory. It is stated that Sir Philip Currie, British Ambassador at Constantinople, has been instructed to demand the release of the unconvicted Armenian pusioners. Great Britism, jointly with the signatories of the Treaty of Berlin, demands the immediate appointment of a European Commissioner to administer the province of Armenia on behalf of the Sultan.

Heavy rains have fallen throughout Japan, causing serious floods and loss of life. The rice crops have been destroyed, and a familie to feared.

THE Emperor of Germany arrived at Cowes on Monday afternoon in his yacht, excited by five men-of-war. The Emperor dired with the Queen at O-bonne in the evening. He will remain at Cowes for a week for the yacht races, and will then go on a visit to Lurd Lonsdale at his shooting-box in the North.

An interview took place, on the 5th, between the German Chancellui and Count Kalnoky, the Austrian Foreign Minister, at Aussee, when they discussed the foreign situation, particularly in regard to Bulgania.

As previously announced, Mr. Gladstone addressed a meeting at Chester in favour of Armenian refains. He strongly denounced the Porte, whose dentals and promises, he said, were valueless England must not fear the word "corection" in dealing with Tinkey. He could not do otherwise. The English press unanimously approve, it is said, of the language used by Mr. Gladstone. All England must now be up in arms against the unspeakable Tirk!

THE rioting at Tabriz has been stopped, and quiet it stored.

REAR-ADMIRAL Rawson was to have sailed for Monthis, or the 8th. If the ultimation which he is instructed to present to the rebel chiefs of the Mynne tribe is disregarded after Mondey, a punitive expedition will go the Shimba range.

of the foreign residents. The remains of the Kuchung victims have FOUR British fronclads were to leave Gibratar on the 8th under sealed been buried at Foochow. Indiguation meetings have been held by orders. It is believed that their destination is Morocco.

MR. Colin Campbell has been appointed Secretary to the Welby Commission on Indian expenditure in place of Mr. C. T. Ritchies resigned.

PRINCE Ferdinand is still absent from Bulgaria, where the situation is grave and complex, owing to the overthrow of all hope of a reconciliation with Russia under the present regime.

THE visit of the Afghan prince is drawing to a close. Colonel Talbot has been created a Knight Commander of the Indian Empire. Mr. T. A. Martin, the Amir's Agent, has been knighted. Lord Salisbury wrote an autograph letter to Mr. Martin, informing him that Her Majesty the Queen would confer the honour of Knighthood upon him. Mr. Martin goes to Osborne on the 12th.

THE steamer Catterthun, bound from Sydney to Hongkong, has foundered on a tock. Sixty persons have been drowned, of whom forty-six are Chinese.

IT is stated that the object of the arrival at Tangier of the British and Spanish squadrons is to obtain Consulates at Fez. as France has already secured a similar concession.

THE Maharaja of Patiala has gone to Ootacamund, where he means to stay for a couple of mouths, with a large stud of thirty-five horses including some tacers. A jockey himself, he has subscribed Rs. 1,000 to the Fund for a testimonial to Grace the cricketer.

BURMA is fast being quieted down. During the second quarter of 1895 the number of violent crimes was 168, of which 51 were dacates, against 299 and 116 in the second quarter of 1894. In Upper Burma the number of dacoites fell from 22 to 6, and in the Lower from 94 to 45.

THE Rangoon Municipal Committee have adopted the report of their Water-works Sub-Committee recommending a loan of 35 lakhs for the new water-works and 20 lakhs for various sanitary improvements, and a tax of two per cent on commodities largely imported into Rangoon by sea, such as ghi, sugar, grain, pulse, tilseed, groundnut oil, and tobacco.

MR. Beatson Bell, the bête noire of the Bengalee, had a tussle with a beast of the forest which he killed. While holding court, he was informed of a strange visitor in the shape of a leopard near Manickgauge. The Magistrate of Dacca immediately ordered a gun and went for the beast followed by his faithful Chuprasi. Mr. Bell attacked the beast but it got the better of him-had him down and was mauling him when, finding his master in danger, the peon bravely came up and handed him another gun. This was the saving of both master and servant. The leopard now left its first prey and turned towards the new comer. This enabled the master to be on his legs again and shoot the beast dead before it could do any injury to the servant

THE amendment of the Civil Procedure Code has been followed up by a Notice of the Judges of the Bengal High Court, in which they order a General List of Commercial Causes separate from the General List of Causes and General List of Suits for Liquidated Claims. In fact, they had been awaiting the amendment to make special arrangements in the original side for commercial suits, that is, suits in which the claim auses out of the ordinary trainsactions of merchants and traders-such as relating to the construction of mercantile documents, exports or imports of merchandise, affreightment, insurance, banking and mercantile agency and mercantile usage. By and bye, the Court will have special Judges for such suits.

IT seems the Printer of the Calcutta Gazette is independent of the

-in any part of the Gazette. It is well, though, that he keeps himself unknown. The High Court notice which we have just mentioned requires more than one correction. It cannot be that Mr Belchambers is ignorant of the number and names of the Judges. We know Sir W. C. Petheram is the Chief Justice who heads the list of signatories to the order. But who Is the second signatory signing himself H. T. Petheram? Messrs, Thacker, Spink and Co. had once transported Mr. Justice Ghose to the Campbell Medical School, The printer of the Gazette imports a new Judge in Mr. Justice C. N. Ghose. He also rabs one of the Judges of one of his nounnal alphabet, probably thinking it too much of a good thing, for the letter occurs many times.

SIR John Lambert having gone on leave and resigned his seat in the Bengal Legislative Council, the Police Commissioner's place in that assembly has been filled by the Police Magistrate Nawab Syud Ameer Hossem. Both are members of the same Order of the Indian Empire, and fast friends. Sir John has not found another native magistrate to his liking. This is the second legislative career of the Nawab Magistrate. He had been member of both the Local and Supreme Conneils for more than one term. He is again selected for the Lower Chamber, with perhaps a prospective lift to the Upper, Khan Bahadoor Mahomed Yousoof was in a manner forced to the repetition of membership in the Bengal Council while he had been longing for the other place. These repeated, appointments of the same persons plainly shew that no other Mahamedan is worthy of a place in the Council presided over by Sir Charles Elhott. If that be the view of the next régime, the two Mahomedans already named will have perpetually to represent their brethien. Is there not another Mahomedan in Bengal who could do as well if not better? So in uch the worse for that community l

THE prosecution of Rai Isra Prasad was commenced in the Patua magis tracy on the 3rd September. Apprehending a foregone conclusion, an application was made by the Babu to the High Court, which transferred the case to the Court of the District Magistrate of Sarun. After a lengthened enquny, that Magistrate, on the 6th June, directed him to execute a bond for Rs. 25,000 with two sureties for Rs. 12,500 each, to be of good behaviour for three years, in default to undergo three years' rigorous imprisonment. The matter came up to the High Court again, on Thursday, the 6th August, when Justices Macpherson and Baneiji, on the application of Mr. Hill, instructed by Messrs, Leslie and Sons, ordered a rule on the District Magistrate of Sarun to show cause why his order should not be set aside, in that it was based, in a great extent, on evidence which was legally madmissible and that if that evidence be excluded the remaining evidence would not support the order.

A RULE has also been issued by the same Judges in connection with the Budh-Gya temple case, Mr. Ghose aigued for a long time and the Bench agreed to a rule on the Magistrate to show cause why the conviction of Jaipal and two others and sentence of Rs. 100 fine should not be set aside on the ground that the evidence disclosed no offence and that the agreement dated the 11th February, 1877, between the Secretary of the Government of Burma and the Mahaut of Buuh Gya was nusconstrued and misunderstood.

While maying for the inle, Mr. Ghose tired to shew that the case was one for the Civil and not the Criminal Courts. The prosecution, represented by Mr. Dhammpal, one of the Secretaries of the Mahabodhi Society of Calcuita which has been founded with the ostensible object of acquiring the Budh Gya temple for the Buddhists, had endeavoured to set up a new ininge of Buddha in the temple. The Mohant's people resented the trespass and opposed it as best they could. If the small knot of Buddhists who go by the name of Maliabodhi Society, wish to vindicate their rights to the temple, a civil and not a criminal case should be the proper form. A criminal forum, presided over by a Magistrate of Mr. Macpherson's calibre and frame of mind, cannot, by its sentence, terminale the real dispute. Mr. Ghose pointed out that, after the strong expressions of opinion in which the Magistrate had indulged, regarding Printing Press Act. His name does not appear-prominently or not the Mohant's rights over the temple, before Dhatmpal had made his complaint, he should not have tried the case himself. The Mahabodki Society have engaged able Counsel to show cluse against the tale, Whatever may be the decision of the High Court in the mitter actually before it, there can be no doubt that the Civil Courts wid be aliminately called up in to declare the rights of parties.

WE read in an English paper that "at the recent Commencement at Harvard, the honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred (in absentia) upon Dr. Fitzedward Hall," The honour for the great American in England comes from the American University late. But it is never too hate to do a right thing, and we hope Dr. Hall will live long to enjoy the distinction from his own commymen. Dr Hill has lived in England for twenty-six years and does not expect again to see his native country which he has not visited for twenty-one years.

In acknowledging receipt of Pandit Shamblin Chindra Vidyaratna's Charetamala, Dr. Fitzedward Hall writes,-"It is a happy and patrionic idea, your commensurating the more noteworthy of your recent countrymen. Among them I notice, with gratification, several of my old personal friends. My respected teacher and coeditor, Bapudeva Sastel, with whom I enjoyed several years' intercomse, I am glad to see that you have biographized. In many respects he was a remarkable man. Emment as a scholar, he was likewise estimable in his private relations,"

THE Doctor further writes,-" Of cheering amen for the future is the fact that Mr. Skrine has written the life of the Traiented Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. The appearance of the book, of which I have ordered a copy, I await with pleasure"

A STATEMENT in our notice list week of the annual meeting of the Science Association has been taken exception to. We said that Dr. Sircar had refused to incorporate the Temple of Science with the Science Association. We heed hardly explain that we spoke of Dr. Sircar as representing the Association, for he could not act on his nwn opinion in a mitter which was the concern of houself as of several others who formed the committee of management. Dr. Sircar himself had no objection to the amalgamation if the objects of both were the same. After a hut and acromomons discussion at a joint meeting of the Association and the League, presided over by the Governor So Richard Temple, it was found, it is needless to say, that the two parties could not agree. We take the final results of that meeting from the proceedings of the Science Association

" His Honour then said that, after having heard both parties, he was "His Honour then said in it, after having heard both parties, he was clearly of opinion must the two finds could not be annalgamated, and, if the two pairies could not combine regenter, he must treat with them separately. After what he had heard that day from the speakers representing the different parties, he must give up all hope of a reconcitation.

The Rev. K. M. Banerjee proposed that, if the two parties could not combine, yet they could both work under the same roof, separately, and heat each other as laying brethren.

His Honour then got up and said that he was certain that no annal-

THE ENGLISH ELECTIONS.

THE Liberal cause in England has gone down. The silent change in the opinion of the British electorate, regarding both Irish Home Rule and the Lords' House of Parliament, was not clearly discerned by either of the great parties. When the lower chamber was dissolved and the parties prepared for the contest that is just over, neither of them was aware of the measure of popularity which the Lords still enjoy in the country. Whatever the absurdity attaching to the idea of hereditary legislators, the British aristociacy stands on a footing entirely different from that in which the aristocracies of ancient Rome and Greece, or of many modern countries, stand. In Britain, only the eldest son of a peer succeeds to the privileges of the peerage. The other children are all commonners. On the failure of heirs, these are often called to the peerage. Success also in the learned professions and the public service frequently leads to recruitment of the peerage from the commonalty. Thurlows's boast of the peerage having sought him instead of his having sought it, rightly considered, would furnish the British peerage also with ground for boast, for it showed how free that peerage is from anything like narrowness in its constitution. Burke pointed out, in one of his unrivalled orations on the American war, that the history of Britain differed materially from the histories of Rome and Greece. In the latter, an incessant struggle was carried on between the two orders of people till an equality was brought about of political privileges. Social distinctions continued, but these were independent of political rights and were entirely founded on wealth, knowledge, and superior civilisation. In the British Isles there has been no struggle between the aristociacy and the common alty for the equalisation of the rights of citizenship. The domestic history of England, in particular, has been the history of the imposition of taxes. The ablest pens and the most eloquent tongues have jointly discussed this subject of taxation, and the whole nation, with a courage that cannot fail to be admired, have fought for reducing to practice the conclusions to which those speculation; have led The cause has been handed down from bleeding sire to son. Peers have combatted, side by side with the people, in the forum and the field, on behalf of those principles. There was a peer among the obnoxious members of the lower chamber who i Charles I wished to arrest in their places; and among those that objected to ship money, there was a peer who like Hampden had asked the tax-collecto to call again. Voltaire, in his serio-comic characterisation of English history, massed or omitted notice, this glorious feature. His remark the is the province of the homeonan to write the home of the island, considering and that persona, the finally determined all affairs of moment makes the letestation of the bloods! I occurrent about the struggles of parties in that country whose polices have been as tempestuous, as the seas that was itis shores. At the same time, however, the measure of not stinted. "Who would have imagined," he said, "that from this horrible abyss, this chaos of dissension, cruelty, ignorance, and fanaticism, a Government should at last spring up, the most perfect, it may be said, now in the world? Yet such has been the event. A sovereign honoured and wealthy, all powerful to do good, without any power to do evil, is at the head of a free, warlike, commercial, and enlightened nation. The nobles on the one hand, and the representatives of the people on the other, share the egislature with the monarch."

The noble fabric of the British constitution has been slowly raised by the exertions as much of the aristocracy as of the people. In the struggles for curbing the arbitrary propensities of the Crown, for establishing the fundamental maxim of the British Government that the subjects are not to be taxed without their own consent expressed through their representatives, the peers have not stood aloof from the people. Such being the attitude of the British peerage, and such its constitution, the day of its fall is yet distant. The appeal to the country in 1895 has resulted in an unmistakable declaration that the House of Lords is to continue with unabated privileges. That the Liberals should have committed so great a blunder as to mistake the voice of a few advanced Radicals for the voice of the British people, is viewed with surprise by everybody The Liberal Unionists have cast their lot with the Conservatives. Danger to the Union and the threat levelled at the upper chamber of the legislature have combined interests that could not, under ordinary circumstances, be combined. It is useless to indulge in forecasts about the manner in which the new Conservative Premier will guide the vessel of State. The Liberals are taunting the Unionists with having abandoned their principles for sharing power with the opponents of progress. Some are predicting the speedy fall of a ministry consisting, as they say, of "all the talents," for except the two great questions about the union and the Lords, the Duke of Devonshire and his party will find it impossible to support measures dictated by purely Conservative principles. But coalitions of opposite interests have not always proved ephemeral. There are many questions appertaining to the border land of both Liberalism and Conservatism in which Lord Salisbury may fairly count upon the support of his new allies. Nor is the Conservatism of the present day actually so narrow and fraught with stolid prejudice as to be altogether hateful to moderate Liberals. The section of the Liberal camp led by Lord Roseberry is essentially Radical Politics have compromise for its essence. The Conservative Premier knows the value of compromise. All things considered, the political atmosphere of England does not show any sign from which it would be safe to predict a short life to the new ministry or a speedy return of the Radicals to power with their declared programme of Home Rule and abolition of the House of Lords.

So far as India is concerned, this great dependency of the British Crown has in the past reaped greater benefits from Conservative than from Liberal administrations. The Queen's Proclamation, viewed as the solemn charter of India's rights, was the work of a Conservative ministry. The rendition of the work had been paid for, the rate would cease. Mysore to its old Hindu rulers was a Conserv- It might rather be called a voluntary contribution ative measure. praise he accorded to the English constitution is never have been passed but for the improbability of a veto by a Conservative Secretary of State, and that we owe the repeal of the Act to the influence of Liberals. The sister Arms Act also has been due to Conservative reaction. But was not the Vernacular Press law supported by Indian members of Lord Lytton's Legislative Council? As regards the Arms Act also, notwithstanding its repeated condemnation by Mr. Gladstone, was it not retained untouched by his party? It is only as regards Manchester agitation that India truly stands in dread of a Conservative Ministry. But considering the absolute need there is of the duties on cotton for enabling the Indian Finance minister to make the two ends meet, the danger, after all, may not be real. At any rate, India is capable of being sacrificed to the exigencies of party struggle as readily by Liberals as by Conservatives.

THE SANITARY DRAINAGE BILL.

THE TEN PER CENT, ARGUMENT.

At the last sitting of the Bengal Council, after a strong opposition, the Bengal Sanitary Drainage Bill was passed. Mr. R. C. Dutt attempted to meet the objection of the Zemindars that the financial clauses involved a breach of the Permanent Settlement. The view of the Zemindars is well known. Anything exacted over and above the revenue payable under their solemn contracts with the State, call it cess, rate, or tax, involves an infringement of the settlement. The question was thoroughly sifted on the occasion of the imposition of the Road Cess. The then Secretary of State for India, without arguing the matter, authoritatively declared that the terms of the settlement did not exclude such local cesses. It cannot be expected that in a question of this kind, where one of the parties to the contract takes it upon himself to decide its meaning, the other party will silently acquiesce. Government willingly neglected the chance of silencing controversy by refusing to submit the question to the arbitrament of the Judges of either the Bengal High Court or Her Majesty's Privy Council. Every time the question has come up, the apsi dixit of officials and their solid votes in the Council chambers have settled it. So far as the sanitary cess is concerned, Mr. R. C. Dutt's attempt, therefore, to meet the contention of the Zemindars by argument deserves every praise. It is true Mr. Dutt gives credit to his colleague, Mr. Risley, for having completely disposed of the objection of the Zemindars. But Mr. Risley's essay is not distinguished for anything new. There has been much special pleading, mixed as usual with assumptions. Leaving Mr. Risley for the present, we will notice a point or two of Mr. Dutt's The daily papers report that "he denied that this was a violation of the Permanent Settlement. It could not be called a cess in the same sense as the Road Cess. It was not permanent: it was not imposed upon the whole province, or the whole of any district, and it was not intended to be permanent. It was a rate which was to be imposed at the instance of local bodies within limited areas for drainage works, and when

To describe the rate as a voluntary contribution is only a specious sophism. The Commons' House of Parliament grants subsidies to the English Sovereign. Those subsidies are met by the people whom the House represents. In paying their dues, therefore, to the State, the people of England are said to make voluntary payments. It is true that the pockets of the English people cannot be touched unless they themselves give their consent through their representatives. But do the District Boards of Bengal at all stand to the people in the relation of representatives and represented? We wish it were so. Many long years will have to roll away be-fore these Boards will be truly representative bodies. The temporary character of the rate for a particular purpose has scarcely any value as an argument. If it means anything, it means that those who have the power of breaking the settlement do not break it for the whole province and for all time to come. They break it in only particular parts of districts and break it for temporary periods. Breakers of a solemn promise they are, but not to the extent contended for by the Zemindars. Mr. Dutt's answer to the objection that the financial clauses affect only the class interested in land to the exclusion of the general community, has no originality. It is based on the principle which Sir William Hunter, the statistician-general of the Government of India, first brought into fashion. "It was said," we quote Mr. Dutt's speech, "that it was inequitable because it fell upon the landed classes. To that proposition he begged to demur. As had been pointed out, the classes terested in land amounted to 80 per cent. of the whole population, and if they excluded the lower classes interested in agriculture it would come up to something like 90 per cent. The remaining 10 per cent. or probably a good proportion of them, were unable to pay any taxes at all, so that by imposing a rate upon people connected with agriculture they imposed a rate practically upon the whole population benefited by the schemes contemplated under the Bill." There, we have the thing cut and dry. The landed classes amount to 80 per cent. of the total populaion. Excluding the lower classes, the figure would come up to 90 per cent. That is almost the whole community, for in matters of this kind who would stop to consider such a trivial exclusion as 10 per cent. of the population? Legislation based upon such statistics is extremely dangerous. The Income Tax is levied upon the general community. Unbearable and objectionable as the tax is, it would become ten times so if a portion of the community were exempted from it. If the exemption be extended to even 5 per cent, of assessible incomes, the rest of the community will regard the imposition as tyrannous. When the clause in the Bengal Rent Act regarding occupancy rights was under discussion in the Supreme Council, it was argued on sehalf of the Zemindars that the principle involved in the change effected by the law, was dangerous. A valuable right was conferred on a class of tenants. By so much was the Zemindar's interest in the land limited. And yet it was proposed to confer that right without the persons who would acquire it doing anything. Payment of rent was directed to be evidenced by printed receipts. The withholding of such receipts was made penal. The cultivating rayyet was not even to produce his receipts for twelve years to prove possession for that period. If only he touched the land once with the plough, the presumption would immediately arise of his possesssing the land for twelve years. Never before was a valuable right bestowed on any class of the people on such easy terms. Nothing was to be done for winning the right. The difficulty was pointed out that lay in the path of the Zemindars in rebutting the presumption. Auction-purchasers in particular, who have not a scrap of paper in their hands, would be absolutely helpless. As against them every rayyet would succeed in acquiring the right of occupancy. These objections were met by the statement that auction-purchasers represented only 5 per cent, of the Zemin-dars of Bengal! Sir William Hunter, therefore, urged that the difficulties of such a small class of landed proprietors should not at all be considered. The clause was adopted. The retort that Sir William invited, although it was never made, is that those who suffer from the action of thieves represent a very small fraction of the community. What need, then, of a largely paid Police and an elaborate criminal justiciary for preventing thieving?

THE LORD'S SONG.

Mrs. Annie Besant has given the world a new translation of the Rhagavad-Gitd, or, as she renders it, The Lord's Song, consisting of 168 pages in all, including the title page, dedication, and preface. It is published by the Theosophical Publishing Society of London, with its branches at Benares and Madras. Printed by Women's Printing Society, the get up is excellent. The version is certainly classical. It preserves the spirit of the original to a greater extent than many translations by English scholars. The terseness of Sanskrit has also been maintained. This, however, has told in many places on perspicuity. Mrs. Annie Besant is not free from the highly amusing spirit of selfreliance which Western scholars often display when they reject the authority of Sreedhara or Sankar or Madhusudan, not on questions of doctrine but on the meanings of Sanskrit words. With them the Petersberg Dictionary is a work of greater authority than the scholiz or commentaries of Indian giants of learning, on matters connected with the etymology or syntax of Sanskrit words and sentences,

Mrs. Besant is undoubtedly a woman of genius. She possesses a highly facile tongue and a pen hardly less so. The booklet is dedicated to "All Aspirants in East and West." "Aspirants" is, of course, a theosophical technicality. It probably means all those individuals, of both sexes, in Asia, Africa, Europe, and America, who believe in "Mahaimas," or expect to see them (if they have not already done so), and who hope to be like them either in their present birth or at some regenerations near or remote. We beg to be pardoned by Theosophists if we explain the word wrongly. Undefined as Theosophy is, most of its technical terms are also undefined. Under the circumstances, they cannot complain if they are sometimes misunderstood by the world outside the pale of Theorophy. The preface is well written and shows that Mis. Annie Besaut has in a great minasure unlerstood the material doctrines of the Gua. Her explanations of the terms Manas and Buddbi, however, are not quite correct. These words, it is said in the preface, do not require to be explained for the Theosophical readers. It is only for the uninitiated that the explanations have been vouchsafed. "Minis," she says, "means Mind, both in the lower mental processes in which it is swayed by the senses, by passions and emotions, and in the higher processes of reasoning; Buddhi is the faculty above the ratiocinating mind, and is the Pure Reason, exercising the discriminative faculty of Intuition, of spiritual discernment." We have here the language of all schools of philosophy. At first it is explained that Buddhi is a faculty; it is then said that that faculty is above the ratiocinating mind; then comes the identification of the faculty of Buddhi with Pure Reason; and lastly, it is said that the faculty of Buddhi exercises the discriminating faculty of Inturion. A faculty exercising another faculty can scarcely be intelligible to non-Theosophical readers. This, however, is not all. Manas does not imply the higher processes of ratiocination. Manas is frequently counted among the senses. "Manah shuhtham indriyam" occurs very frequently in Sanskrit literature. Buddhi is the faculty of ratiocination. Manas is the servitor of Buddhi even as the senses are the servitors of Manas. Buddhi is commonly described as "nicebayátmiká," meaning that it discriminates and leads to certitude of knowledge. Discrimination or certitude of knowledge must depend upon ratiocination. Then, again, what is meant by "the discriminative faculty of Intuition?" The capital Idoes not help us much in the connection. Intuition, as ordinarily employed, means knowledge independent of ratiocination. It is not the province of Intuition to discriminate. It seizes ideas at once,---ideas whose truth is afterwards sought to be established by ratiocination. We are not aware of the word Intuition having been used in the sense of the discriminating faculty. At any rate, Buddhi, as used in the Gra, implies the ratiocinative faculty which derives the materials upon which it works from Manas.

Theosophists are always for mysterious interpretations of common things. We are, therefore, not at all surprised at Mrs. Annie Besant's endeavour to find out the esoteric signification of the Gita. The passage is characteristic. We present it to the reader without mutilation:

"Such is the obvious teaching of this sacred book. But as all the acts of an Avatara are symbolical, we may pass from the outer to the inner planes, and see in the field of Kurukshetra the battle-field of the Soul, and in the sons of Druarashtia enemies it meets in its progress; Arjuna becomes the type of the struggling Soul of the disciple, and Shri Krishna is the Logos of the Soul. Thus the teaching of the ancient battle-field gives guidance in all later days, and trains the aspiring Soul treading the steep and thorny Path that leads to Peace. To all such Souls in East and West come these Divine lessons, for the Path is one, though it has many names, and all Souls seek the same goal, though they may not realise their unity."

We thought that the idea of Emincipation worked out in the Gita, not to say anything of the doctrines of rebirth and the bonds of action, of the practice of penances for making oneself independent of "pairs of opposites," the capacity of well fought battles to lead the slain to heaven, and the obligation of duly discharging the duties of caste, is essentially Indian. It seems that it is not so. "Aspiring Souls," we are told, in the East and the West, realise the same ideas.

In several places of the translation we have marked "conches", as the plural of "conch." All the lexicous we have consulted give conchs as the plural form. We suppose the native gentlemen who examined the proofs, mispronouncing the word, pluralised it by instead of a Some errors of rendering may be noticed and there. The well-known verse 5 of Lesson II, is thus translate';

"Bector to eat in this world even the beggir's crust that to slay bleed Gurus, high minded. Slaying these Gurus, well wishers. I should to stay blood-besprinkled feasts."

In the second line of the verse occurs the adjective arthakam at The commentation Sreedhara first takes it as equivalent to "arthakam matmakan" and as qualifying "bhogan." Then follows the remark, introduced by "yadva," that it qualifies "Gurun." It is, "of course, well known in this country that the last of two interpretations given by a commentator represents his own mature view. "Artha-kaman," therefore, should, according to this great and universally venerated scholast, be taken as an adjective of " Gurun." There is a contrast in the verse, shown very beautifully. At first Aijnna says that it would be better to eat the teggar's crust than slay those bigh-minded Gurus, Bhishma and Drona. Next, he remirks that even if those Gurus be taken as "arthikaman," that is, as stained by cupidity, even then they should not be slain. Among the host of commentators nobody has ever suggested that "arthakaman" is capable of being taken as implying "well-wishers." Indeed, the error is so gross that the variest tyro in Sanskrit would not commit it. Mrs. Annie Bessant, however, makes light of all the commentators and, on her own authority, renders the word as equivalent to "well wishers." Here is how she disposes of such vermin as Sreedhara and Sankara and Madhusudana: "More often translated, greedy of wealth, but the word is used elsewhere for well-wisher, and the term is move in accordance with the tone of Arjuna's remark." "Arthakaman" used elsewhere for "well-wishers!" W. e e, pray? The fact is, Theosophists by Intuition, know more than other people.

TEACHING OF SCIENCE IN INDIA. SPEECH BY SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT.

At the annual meeting of the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science Sir Charles Elliotr, the President, said:

I look back with pleasure to the time, in the year 1891, when I first attended as President and addressed the annual meeting of this Association. I now address it in the last year of my Lieutenant-Governorship, and it is a satisfaction to hear what your Secretary, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, has been able to announce to you regarding the Progress which the Association has made beginning from its origin, twenty years ago, when the idea first came into his head of starting the Association and carrying it on, to more recent times, when Lord Ripon and afterwards Lord Lansdowne were pairons of the Association, down to the present day. During the last three years I find from the reports of the annual meeting that Di. Mahendra Lal Sirear has addressed you every year, and has chiefly dwelt on two points, and these two points he has again im-pressed upon us in the present year. The first of these leading subjects of his arguments was the importance of creating and pro-curing more funds with the object of ensuring the establishment of a paid staff of lecturers to carry on the work of this Association. fully agree with him that you can never expect that the services of honorary lecturers will be available for long series of years with the same energy and the same intellectual freshness which you may expact to receive from paid lecturers. Honorary lecturers will carry on the work for a time with ability and enthusiasm, but, after the first cuthusiasm is worn out, cannot in the ordinary course of things toil on in the same hearty manner, and the work will languish. is not fair to lay such a great strain upon their time and energy, and you must expect that the teaching will fall off unless it is kept up by the stimulus of salaries. I hope that the appeal that your S cretary has made may reach the ears of those who are interested in the progress of the country and who have wealth to contribute. We have heard this evening the names of those who have bestowed from their abundance and their liberality large sums upon this institution and have materially helped to increase its sphere of usefulbenefactors of the public, and especially of the youth of this country, and I rejoice to see some of them sitting round me here in this hall. I rejoice also to think that others who are far off, like the Maharaja of Kuch Behar and the Maharaja of will read the report of this Association, and feel that the grantude of the rising genera ion of Bengal is theirs; and this will be sufficient recompense to them for the generosity which they have

The other point which the Doctor has so frequently tried to impress upon you, and which I agree in, is that it is impossible to expect that the youth of this country will, to any great extent, take up the study of science for its own sake without the expectation of a remulenture return, other immediate or prospective. Some provise a must be made in order to enable them to live by the art which they protess. In the year 1892 the Dietor said that it was necessary not only that we should remunerate the teachers, but that we should also encourage the boys and provide for them from a pecuniary point of view. In the years 1893-94 he made similar returark—that the young men must be convinced of the material advantages to be derived from the study of science before they will dovote their time to its pursuit. We have just heard in the address delivered to-day a similar sentiment expressed as tersely and as strongly as before. Now these views are entirely shared in by the Government, and I wish, as this is the last occasion on which I shall address you, to point out to you how much the Government of Bengal has done during my tenure of office to encourage the study of science, and how much I have been privileged to assist in this movement, and how far I have been able to carry out those views which Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar has so wisely and so strongly impressed upon myself and upon you.

But before I turn directly to that subject, I will say one word with regard to the appeal which he made just now on the subject of the assistance which the Government should give to this instituof the assistance which the Government should give to this institu-tion, and his request that an arrangement might be made by which a certificate given by this institution of satisfactory progress and advancement in the study of science should cause a certain amount of preference to be given to candidates for Government employ-ment requiring a knowledge of science, over other candidates who were students of other institutions. Now what I must say to you on this subject is, that Government looks upon science as a whole, and not as connected solely with this Association. The chief object to which I have tried to direct my endeavours has been to create elsewhere similar opportunities and similar means of obtaining advancement in science to the opportunities and means which are presented here. It would be impossible for the Government to put aside those who were trained in its own institutions and say that it will give preserence to those of this institution. All that it can do is to give preference to those who have followed a full course of study in science, regardless of the place where they studied and the institution to which they belonged. The object, I believe, of this institution is to supply means of education in science to those not attached to schools and colleges, or who belong to schools and colleges which do not possess a laboratory, or the needful instrucolleges which do not possess a isooratory, or the needful instru-ments, or sufficient machinery, or the requirements and equipments necessary for the pursuing of these studies. We have all these things at some of our Government institutions, and further, we do all we can to increase and improve the scientific apparatus of those schools and colleges, and we cannot put the students of this Association on a different level from those of our own insatutions.

ciation on a different level from those of our own instantions.

Now with regard to the work which the Government has done during the last four or five years, I will take it under the different heads of the institutions which are supported by Government.

First and foremost is the great Presidency College, not far from this place. We have built a laboratory there at a cost of a lakh and-a-half of rupees, which is fitted up with almost everything that a laboratory requires, and with every requirement and equipment which is necessary to put the students of physical science at this institution on a level with those trained in the best-equipped laboratory in any part of the world. The effect of what has been done in this direction is to be seen from the numbers of those who have passed ont in recent years having taken up the B. Course. The number of students who passed the B.A. in the second or B. number of students who passed the B.A. in the second or B. Course in 1892-93 was 37, in 1893-94 it increased to 65, and in the last year, 1894-95, it rose to 84. Of those who took the M.A. degree in science there were five in 1892-93, twelve in 1823-94, and fifteen in 1894-95. Therefore I think we are able to assert that we have not only supplied a means, but we have also met a demand, and that the means that we have created has been taken advantage of by those who wish to follow these studies.

Recently we have opened a Geological course in the Presidency College, and one young man took his M. A. degree in Geology, being the first, or perhaps the second, who has taken that degree since the University was formed. And now comes in the case which Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar has given, in which he asks what is that young man to do with the geological knowledge which he has acquired? It is extremely difficult at present for a geologist to find employment of a suitable kind, but the Government of Bengal has made an application to the Government of India to make a temporary appointment for him in the Geological Department and see what he knows and can do. If it turns out that he has merely learned the books and the formulæ for the sake of taking the degree, and that he has no capacity for comparing and observing things, and shows little intention or inclination to carry on his studies, the Government do grant my request, the young man's probation will not last very long. But on the other hand, if he puts his mind to his work, and desires opportunities to travel about to make himself acquainted and familiar with the formation of the moun-tains and the mineral wealth of the country, then there is a vast field before him for useful and remunerative work in the prosecution of such enquiries.

I turn next to the Sibpur College for Engineering. That institurin next to the Sippur College for Engineering. I hat insti-tution, as you all know, has been very largely developed and trans-formed during the last few years. We have decided after much discussion to give up the old system of carrying on the work shops as a remunerative business belonging to the Public Works Department, and allowing our boys only to attend there to see how the paid artisans were working to carry out some portions of the rougher parts of the work under their directions. We have now separated the workshops into two parts, and the workshops attached to the College are entirely distinct from the workshops under the P. W.

D. Of course there are a few instructors, but there are no paid workmen; the whole of the work has to be done by the boys whis are being trained there in these classes, as engineers, apprentices, and artisans. They are making a new laboratory, and all the desks, furniture, and appliances are being made by the boys themselves: and thus the starting of these workshops has been a practical schooling of the greatest value to them, and they turn out ma-chines of considerable excellence. I saw the other day a lathe which was said to be worth in the market about Rs. 500, but the raw material of which cost only Rs. 80, the labour being entirely supplied by the boys. These machines are used in the College itself, and when these workshops are completely fitted out they will be and when these workshops are completely fitted out they will be able to supply all the industrial schools in the country. The number of these schools is rapidly increasing, and they have all been affiliated to the Sibpur College. The result of that affiliation is that they are inspected by the Principal, and when the boys have completed the course in these industrial schools they come on to the Sibrur College, with a mightage schools they come on to the Sibpur College with or without scholarships, and are admitted if they can pass the examination even in the second year so as to give them a fair start to carry on their training.

Further, we have alranged to start a mining class in the Sibpur College, and, as you know, mining is an industry which is just beginning to open out a vista of varied and remonerative employment in this country. I am sorry to say that our offer in promising to start this mining class has not as yet been sufficiently met. It was decided that we should admit to this class only boys who had taken an engineering degree; but as vet we have not got a single application from any Bachelors of Engineering. These classes have been kept open a second year, and I hope that after the next examination of the B. E. degree, which will soon take place, or perhaps has recently been held, we will get boys to attend this class. If no Engineers offer themselves we shall then throw the classes open to the apprentices, and future engineers will not thank their predecessors for having lost this opportunity. Two valuable scholarships have been instituted, and will be given it suitable can didates appear. The theoretical ms riction will last for one year, and after that there will be a year of practical training in the mines. We have arranged with several mines to enable the boys taken to pay a premium of Rs. 500, which is required for each boy who is received as an apprentice in the mines. Thus you will see that the Government has for some time been doing what Dr. Mahendra Lal Streat recommends, and is at present doing everything not marely to smooth throughout the property acquires of the control of the cont thing not merely to supply knowledge, but to supply a course of life which will give remunerative employment to those who follow this course of study.

Another important matter we have in hand in connection with Another important matter we have in nanu in connection with the Sibpur College is the introduction of electrical teaching. We are going to start an installation of electrical lighting for the College and workshops, and the putting up of those works, and seeing how they are carried on will of itself be a useful education for the boys. We also intend to have a class of students in electrical science, and We also intend to have a class of students in electrical science, and the plant which is required for this purpose is estimated to cost L400. In order to ntilise the knowledge thus gained we have applied to the Government of India to guarantee one appointment in the Telegraph Department every alternate year to a qualified student who passes creditably through the course at the Sibpur College. You will see from what I have said, that in making these Conege. Tou will be read was a recommendations and creating these openings for the study of practical science Government has been going to a considerable expense, and I have no doubt that we shall find this expense is well returned to us and to the country at large by the benefits which will be conferred on the boys who take proper advantage of the training which it is open to them to receive.

I turn next to the School of Art. This institution has recently been rebuilt at a cost of a lakh and a half of rupees. We have also fitted up the art gallery at the cost of Rs. 18,000, and spent Rs. 10,000 on pictures to be added to the collection already exist-The Art School has been taken from its unsuitable quarters at the end of this street, and the boys are now put into the lighted, arry, and palatial quarters in Chowringhee. It was at first thought that though the new building situated in Chowringhee would be pleasant and convenient to the teachers, it would not be so suitable to the boys, but I am glad to find that this has not turned out to be so, the attendance having risen from 198 in 1892-93 to nearly 300 in 1894-95. The number is constantly increasing, and before long the school will have to impose a certain degree of closure and not admit every one who offers himself. Several of these students optain remunerative employment in the Survey Department and the Botanical Girden, and a number of private firms and companies employ them for engravings on wood, lithography, drawing, etc. If you wish to see a full account of what these hoys do, you must turn to Sir Alfred Croft's annual report on Education for the year 1893-94, in which he goes into the matter at great length.

I had little difficulty in detending this school against an attack that was made upon it from England. To my great surprise one day we received a despatch in which it was said that all the schools of art in India were believed to be expensive and useless failures. The Hon. Mr. Buckland wrote a reply which completely vindicated the Indian schools of art from the reflection cast upon them, and I can say from my personal knowledge that it was not true also either of the Calcutta or the Lahore School of Art. I must not forget to mention another source of employment which is open to the boys who go through the school of art, viz., the large number of posts of drawing masters which are being created by Govern-We have extended drawing to most of the Government zillah or high schools, and to all the training schools. And every one who wishes to take service as a teacher in the vernacular schools must know drawing. Unless he has obtained a certificate in it he will not be qualified to obtain employment in the middle or primary school. In this way we have employed from 50 to 60 young men as drawing masters in these schools, and the knowledge of this subject is getting more and more important. I trust that the time will come when the example set in the primary schools of the Central Provinces will be followed here, and that drawing will become an essential in every school. This teaching is general ly allowed to be most beneficial in training little boys to observe what they are looking at and to distinguish one animal from another, one tree from another, and so on. I look upon the School of Art as the great source from which education of this kind will be spread over the whole country.

will now only briefly mention the Medical College, which does so much for teaching our young men who go out from there as assistant surgeons, the rudiments of medical science, and supplies them with the means of getting lucrative practice. We are rebuilding the Medical College at great expense. Ever since I came to Bengal I have telt that this is a crying want. As now existing, it is not a place where boys should be collected in large numbers: there is not enough space, or light, or air : it is not even sanitary and it makes the work for the masters and the boys most difficult to carry on. I have devoted one lash of rupees for the rebuilding of one section only, the anatomical section of the college, and I hope my successors will go on with the work and improve the chemical and other sections and give sufficient space, light, and air to all who intend to follow the medical profession. I will also mention the fact that we are now building a new laboratory for the Dacca College at a cost of Rs. 40,000, and for the Cuttack College at a cost of Rs. 15,000, out of which I am glad to announce that at a cost of Rs. 15,000, out of which I am glad to announce that Rs. 10,000 was given by the Maharaja of Mourbhunj, who studied in the College and who gives this money as testimony of the gratitude that he feels for the education which he received there. I regret to see that the prize which I myself have founded for the promotion of original research has up to now not been as successful as might have been expected or hoped. But there is no reason despairing, and I hope a boy bred up in this Association will yet be able to carry it off by applying the rudiments of knowledge acquired here to the prosecution of research in some useful and practical question after he has ceased his studies.

The only thing that I wish to say in addition to the statistical facts I have given is a matter in which I have to some extent been anticipated by the Secretary. I had intended to draw your attention to the remarkble comparison which may be made between the success of the Japanese and the defeat of the Chinese in the recent war. Dr. Sircar has already touched on this comparison, and I will not dwell upon that very much because it is so obvious. seemed to every one a very small country in compatison with China and so late as four or five years ago it would not have been placed on the same level with China. Only a few years ago, a learned gentleman, Mr. Pearson, wrote a book in which he said that the Chinese were the coming race, and that they would overrun the world. It so happened that when I was last in England I met Mr. Pearson and told him: "With great deference to your views, I think you are wrong. I believe that China is not the coming race but the receding tace. There wis not the slightest hope for China unless she looked facts in the face and devoted herself to the study of science rather than the study of literature, and rendered all the branches of her Administration more honest and more efficient." If I may say so, China follows the A course and Japan the B course. (Laughter and cheers.) The education of China is entirely literary: they do not apply their knowledge to any practical purpose; while, on the contrary, the education of Japan has given itself entirely to practical purposes. These practical purposes are very largely military purposes. From a humanitation point of view it is a matter of regret that they are so largely military; but it is chiefly owing to this that she has beaten her formulable tival and raised herself to a high position of respect, not or'y in the eyes of the Chinese, but of all European nations also.

G e further remark and I have done. I will only mention the plague at Hongkong, of which you hav heard and which we were so much aimed lest it should be imported here, that for the first time in the listory of Calcutta I had to put on a quarantine in the High. Who was it that discovered the origin of that disease, the bacillus by which it was caused? Not an English savant nor a German, but a Japanese doctor---a scientific man, who, so to speak, had gone through the Japanese B course. Now, why is it speak, had gone through the Japanese B course. Now, why is it that while we are here living smong bacilli, in the very home of bacteria, no Indian student has helped us to discover the bacteria of some of the hateful diseases that devastate the population, and ruin the happiness of so many homes? Why should we have to turn to Dr. Koch, Dr. Haffkine, or Dr. Cunningham to throw light on the origin of cholera or of malarial fever? I trust that some from how will be able to mine away that separate in the second in the second. of you boys will be able to wipe away that reproach in the near funce, and that you will set your minds to make discoveries which will save the population from the diseases which prey on it.

If anything of this kind comes out of this institution, if any of the boys trained here should afterwards be shown to have done such work as this, all I can say is that that will be the best rewards that can possibly be given to those who have been such good and true friends to you as Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, Father Lafont, and other honorary lecturers and supporters of this Association. (Loud and continued applause.)

ONLY FOUR TO MAN THE PUMPS.

DRAR, dear ! When you came to think of it haw closely related things are; how one thing brings up another. Ideas are like a lot of beads on a string, aren't they?

A letter I have just been reading makes me remember what happened to me one winter about twenty years ago. The story is too long to tell here, so I'll merely give you the rail end of it. I was supercargu on a back bound from London in Rin. A tremendous gate, lasting five days, wrecked us. Forty eight hours after it ceased there were four men and no more left on the vessel. The captain had been killed by a falling spar, three of the crew washed uverboard, and the rest of the show's company (save us four) went away in the long boat with the first a falling spar, three of the crew washed overboard, and the rest of the ship's company (save us four) went away in the long boat with the first and second maies. We were taking in water through a leak at the rate of six inches an hour. Working with all our might the four of us could pump that out in forty minutes, but we must do it every hou. It was awful work. For two days we kept it up, without sleep. Then we stopped, took to the quarter boat and shoved off. The sea was quiet—no wind. While we lay to within a mile of her the ship threw up he nose and went down stern first. We were picked up the next day by a Danish birg.

day by a Danish big.

Now the odd thing is that the letter which reminded me of that experience has nothing whatever to say about ships. Please help me to perience has nothing whatever to say about ships. Please help me to find out the association.

The lady who writes the letter says that in July, 1881, she got a bad fright. Exactly what it was she doesn't tell. I wish she did. Anyway it so upset her that she didn't get over the effects of it for nine years. After that her appetite fell off; she hast all real relish for food, and what she did eat only made trouble instead of nourshing her. It gave her pain in the pit of the stomach and (currously enough) between the showlders. She says her eyes and skin presently turned yellow as a butter up. Her face and abdumen swelled, and her feet the same, the latter so much so that she was obliged to have her shoes made larger.

"I got little sleep at night," she says, "and was in so much pain I had to be propped up with pillows. For weeks together I could not her down in bed. I had a dry, hollow cough, and bad night sweats. Then diarrhoea set in, and my bowels became ulcerated. I was often in dreafful agony for forty-eight hours at a time. Then I would have a chill as though a bucket of cold water were poured down my back. I got so low I could no longer sew, knit, or du any housework or look after my children. My sister had to come and help in the house.

"Everybody said I was no a decline and must die. What I suffered for eight years tongue cannot tell. The doctor could do nothing for me. He said my complaint was complicated and bad to deal with, lo 1886 I went as an outdoor patient to the Shrewebury Infinitual, but see. The witer is in good health now, but why did her case a emind me of the shipwrek? Let's settle that first. The association is easy and annotation.

only got transient relier."

The writer is in good health now, but why did her case remind me of the shipwreck? Let's settle that first. The association is easy and natural. Just see. The ship sank because we four men hadn't the strength to pump out the water as first as it came in. Twenty inen might have got her into purt. It is the last straw that breaks the camel's back; the last unsupplied need that makes poverty abject and desperate.

camel's back; the last unsupplied need that makes poverty abject and desperate.

These bodies of ours carry the seeds of disease with them all the time—chrefly the poisons created by imperfect digestion, made worse by careless hibits. But as long as nothing extraordinary happens we manage to scrape along to a half-and-half sort of fashion. Yet we've got in our blood the stuff that any of a dozen diseases is made of, only waiting for something to set it aftire. While the liver, kidneys, lungs and skin keep us fairly free—that is, don't let the load get too heavy—we say, "Oh, yes, I'm tolerably well, thank you." Little pains and unpleasant symptoms bother us now and then, but we don't fancy they mean anything.

By and-by something happens. A cold, too hearty a meal, a night of dissipation, an affliction through death or loss of property, a fright as in Mrs. Bunce's case, &c. Over we go. The last straw has crushed us. One lones spark has blown up the barrel of powder. The crew is too small to save the ship. The kidneys, liver, skin, and stomach strike work, and we must have help right away or perish. All of which means the explosion of latent indigestion and dyspepsia poisons in the blood.

There I isn't it plan why I thought of the ship? No. for the conclusion of the lady's story. She says: "In 1889 I first heard of Mother Clusion of the lady's story. She says: "In 1889 I first heard of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. Hilf a bottle made me feel better, and by Seeping on taking it I was soon strong and well as ever. (Signed) Mrs. Ann Buuce, The Paik, Worthen, near Shrewsbury, February 22nd, 1893."

If there were only a way to save sinking ships as certain and trustworthy as Mother Sengel's medicine is in the case of sinking human bodies, what a blessing it would be to poor sailors.

CONTEMBORARY POETRY.

TO THE STETHOSCOPE. (Concluded from Page 374.)

Closed the book,

With gladsome look
Still he sits and visions weaveth.
Fancy with her wiles deceiveth;
Life to come with glory gildeth;
And though all is bleak and bare,
With perversest labour buildeth
Wondrous castles in the air.
He who shall possess each palace,
Fortune has for him no malice,
Only countless joys in store:

Over rim.

And mantling brim,

Whilst he dreams,
The future seems
Like the present spread before him:
Nought to fear him,
All to cheer him,
Coming greatness gathers o'er him;
And into the ear of Night
Thus he tells his visions bright:—

"I shall be a glorious Poet !

All the wond'ring world shall know u,

Listening to melodious hymning;

I shall write immortal songs.

"I shall be a Painter limning
Pictures that shall never fade;
Round the scenes I have pourtrayed
Shall be gathered gazing throngs:
Mine shall be a Titian's palette!

"I shall wield a Phidias' mallet!
Stone shall grow to life before me,
Looks of love shall hover o'er me,
Beauty shall in heart adore me
"That I make her charms immortal.
Now my foot is on the portal
Of the house of Fame:
Soon her trumpet shall proclaim
Even this now unhonoured name,
And the doings of this hand

 "Music? my bewitching pen
Shall enchant the souls of men.
Aria, fugge, and strange sonata,
Opera, and gay cantata,
Through my brain,
Iq linked train,
Hark! I hear them winding go,
Now with half-hushed whisper stealing,
Now in full-voiced accent pealing,
Ringing loud, and murmuring low.
Scarcely can I now refrain,
Whilst these blessed notes remain,
From pouring forth one undying angel-strain.

As no living lips have spoken—
Advocate the poor and weak,
Plead the cause of the heart broken :...
And this little tongue, the earth
With its burning words shall fill.

"Ye stars which bloom like flowers on high, Ye flowers which are the stars of earth, Ye rocks that deep in darkness he, Ye seas that with a loving eye Gaze upwards on the azure sky, Ye waves that leap with mirth , Ye elements in constant strife, Ye creatures full of bounding life . I shall unfold the hidden laws, And each unthought-of wondrous cause, That waked ye into buth. A high-priest I, by Nature taught Her mysteries to reveal : The secrets that she long hath sought In darkness to conceal, Shall have their mantle rent away, And stand uncovered to the light of day. O Newton ! thou and I shall be Twin brothers then ! Together linked, our names shall sound Upon the lips of men."

Like the sullen heavy boom
Of a single gun at sea,
When athwart the gathering gloom,
Awful rocks are seen to loom Frowning on the lee;
Like the muffled-kettle-drum,
With the measured tread,
And the wailing trumpet's hum,
Telling that a soldier's dead;

Like the deep cathedral bell Tolling forth its doleful knell, Saying, " Now the strife is o'er, Death bath won a victim more "-So, thou doleful Stethoscope ! Thou dost seem to say, " Hope thou on against all hope, Dream thy life away : Little is there now to spend; And that little's near an end. Saddest sign of thy condition Is thy bounding wild ambition; Only dying eyes can gaze on so bright a vision. Ere the spring again is here, Low shall be thy head, Vainly shall thy mother dear, Strive her breaking heart to cheer, Vainly strive to hide the tear Oft in silence shed. Pangs and pains are drawing near, To plant with thorns thy bed : Lo! they come, a ghastly troop Like fierce vultures from afar; Where the bleeding quarry is, There the eagles gathered are ! Ague chill, and fever burning, Soon away, but swift returning, In unceasing alternation; Cold and clammy perspiration, Heaft with sickening palpitation,

Cold and clammy perspiration,
Heaft with sickening palpitation,
Panting, heaving respiration;
Aching brow, and wasted limb,
Troubled brain, and vision dim,
Hollow cough, like dooming knell
Saying 'Bid the world farewell!'
Parchéd lips, and quenchless thirst,
Everything as if accurst;

Flowers without the least perfume;
Gone from everything its bloom;
Music but an idle jangling;
Sweetest tongues but weary wrangling;
Books, which were most dearly cherished,
Come to be, each one, disrelished,
Clearest plans grown all confusion;
Kindest friends but an initiosion;
Weary day, and weary night—

Weary night, and weary day;
Would God it were the morning light!
Would God the light were passed away!
And when all is dark and dreary,
And thou are all worn and weary,
When thy heart is sad and cheerless,
And thine eyes are seldom tearless,
When thy very soul is weak,
Satan shall this victum seek

Night by night will hover nigh thee, With accursed wiles will try thee, Soul and spirit seek to buy thee.

Day by day he will be by thee,

Close we here. My eyes behold, As upon a sculpture old, Life all warm and Death all cold Struggling which alone shall hold—Sign of woe, or sign of hope!—To his lips the Stethoscope.

But the strife at length is past, They have made a truce at last, And the settling die is cast.

Life shall sometimes sound a blast, But it shall be but "Tantivy," Like a hurrying war reveillie, Or the hasty notes that levy Eager horse, and man, and hound, On an autumn morn, When the sheaves are off the ground, And the echoing bugle-horn Sends them racing o'ver the scanty stubble corn. But when I a-hunting go, I. King Death, I that funeral trump shall blow With no bated breath. Long drawn out, and deep and slow Shall the wailing music go: Winding horn shall presage meet Be of coming winding-sheet, And all living men shall know That beyond the gates of gloom, In my mansions of the tomb, I for every one keep room, And shall hold and house them all, till the very Day of Doom.

THERE was an employé in the finance department of Madrid who bore the name—Don Juan Nepomuceno de Burionagonatoto-recagageazcoecha. India is a land of wonders. But at present we cannot call to mind a longer nominal phrase than Ashikamaidal, padmaprakashita-dhanavidyagoonalava Gouri. This paragon of sweetness and excellence is a daughter of the late reformer Durgaram Mancharam Mehtajeea, a Nager Brahman of Surat, in the Bombay Presidency.

now found necessary to raise the number of hours a day. It has been now found necessary to raise the number of hours to eleven. Before the Bill sanctioning the rise is passed, orders have been issued not to prosecute any infringement of the condemned current law. The Dundee mill-owners, overflowing with the milk of human kindness for the dusky denizens of India, have moved the Secretary of State for India for restricting the hours in Indian mills for women and children.

THE Greek Chamber has at last passed a law reducing the tax on the export of rusins by 4 diachmas per 1,000 litres, and imposing a retenue of fifteen per cent, on those exported for trade purposes.

THE new Gracco-Russian commercial treaty, which is to last for ten years, provides for a fixed import duty on Russian cereals and for a monopoly of Russian kerosine oil in Greece. The treaty was intended or is expected to drive American petroleum from the Greek market.

A FOURTH part of the main line of the great Trans-Siberian Railway has been completed, after employing 70,225 persons and costing 73.437,111 roubles. A special harbour at Batoum is being constructed for the coasting trade between that port and Russia.

THE Rev. William Hastie, D. D., late Principal of the General Assembly's Institution in this city, and recently assistant to the Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh, has been appointed Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow.

" ELECTION E.gs, three a penny. Notice : not sold for human food," is the latest development in trade brought about by the English practice of pelting opposition candidates at the hustings. It is said that in one towo, during the late hours of polling, several itinerant merchants cleared, by such eggs, a good sum of money.

WE read:—
"Mr. Herbert Spencer has refused the decoration which the German Emperor offered him. The incident recalls the fact that the Emperor's grandfither offered the decoration of the Iron Cross to Thomas Carlyle, and somewhat to the surprise of his friends the gruff old sage accepted it. The knoon was conferred in consideration of the services of the Scottish philosopher in bringing the personality of the great Frederick to the attention of the English-speaking world. Indeed, no worthy biographer of the sarion and, it might be said, familier of the Prossian Kingdom had appeared mong his German countrymen. Carlyle subsequently refused an English title, and when it was pointed out that he had accepted the Prossian monach's favour, he grindly replied that that had never been conferred, so far as he could ascertain, except for ment. In a letter to a friend, however, he said that the Emperor would have bestowed a more varued gift if he had sent him half a pound of good tobacco."

JOGENDRA Nath Mookerjee, Vakil, High Court, N.-W.P., has been senienced by the Sessions Judge of Allahabad, to three years' rigorous imprisonment. He was charged under sections 193 and 109, 196 and 471, Indian Penal Cade, with using a forged document to get an appeal admitted beyond time, All the assessors were of opinion that he was guilty. Mr. Blennerhasset found him not guilty under sections 193 and 109 Concurring with the assessors, he found him guilty under section 471. The charge under section 106 was staved.

A DIVISION Beach of the Calcutta High Court, consisting of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beverley, have held that a duly certificated Mukhtear can, when properly authorised by a power of attorney, file applications in Civil Courts of all grades for execution of decrees, The Subordinate Judge of Nadia had held the contrary. The impression, we think, is very general among Muisiffs and Subordinate Judges that certificated Mukhteans, even when holding powers of attorney, are incompetent to act for parties in the Civil Court. Upon a proper construction of the provisions of the Legal Practitioners Act and sections 36 and 37 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there can be little doubt that this impression is incorrect.

NOTES & LEADERETTES,

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS.

PARLIAMENT was opened on Thursday by Rayal Commission. Her Majesty, in her Speech from the Throne, which was read by the Lord Chancellor, said :- I have received communications from the Foriegn Powers which assure me of the continuance of their good-will. No complication has arisen in any quarter calculated to endanger the peace of Europe, and I trust that the peace concluded between China and Japan will be enduring. I have observed strict neutrality and taken no action in respect thereto, except such as appeared likely to favour the termination of the war. I deeply regret the atrocious outrages on the English Missionaries in the province of Sukein, where the Chinese Government are taking active measures which, I hope, will result in an effective punishment of the murderers and all persons in any degree responsible for them.

Alluding to the troubles in Armenia, Her Majesty says that they have been attended with horrors, which have moved the indignation of all the Christian nations in Europe, and the English people especially, and Her Majesty unxiously awaits the decision of the Sultan regarding the reforms in that quarter jointly suggested by the British, French and Russian Ambassadars as being necessary to prevent a recurrence of constant disorder.

Considering the season of the year Her Majesty says that it will probably be found more convenient to defer until another session the consideration of any important legislative measures except those that are necessary to provide for administrative charges.

Mr. Gully has been re-elected Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. Justin McCarthy has been unanimously re-elected Chairman of the Anti-Parnellites. It is stated that the meeting was a harmonious one.

The House of Lords has voted the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech

In the debate Lord Salisbury and that the Sultan of Turkey would be guilty of a grave error if he declined to aid the Powers in their endeavours to extirpate anarchy and cinelty in Armenia. Regarding the massacre in China he said that if China was neglectful or lukewarm in punishing the culprits, further action would be necessary on the part of the British Government.

His Lordship defended the retention of Chirral, and said that it was not intended to increase the military expenditure or the forces in India for that purpose. Lord Rosebery opposed the retention of Chitral, and demanded the production of the opinion expressed by Su Donald Stewari. He urged the need for financial unlitary concentration in India.

Dr. Tanuer for giving the he in the House of Commons to Mr. Harrington, and retusing to apologise when called upon by the Speaker, was named and suspended.

IT is stated that the Sultan is firmly resolved not to admit foreign control over the reforms in Armenia. The Grand Vizier counsels his Majesty to make the concession, but the palace party are opposed to it, and the Grand Vizier's position is considered precatious.

THE Times concurs in the protests of the European community in China against the inadequacy of the demands for rediess made by Great Britain and the other Powers concerned, and states that if the Pekin Government is incapable of, controlling the Provincial authorities, Great Britain must deal with the latter duectly. A commission, consisting of British and American Consuls, one American Naval officer, and three missionaries with a strong Chinese escort, has started for Kucheng, to enquire into the recent massacres. At a meeting held by the Church Missionaries Society, a resolution was passed that no disaster would be allowed to interfere with the Society's work. One British and one American ranser have sailed for Foochow for the protection of their respective subjects there.

REUTER'S agency has been informed that the Franco-Chinese treaty only agrees to certain rectifications on the frontier of Changhung, not the cession of the whole of that State east of the Mekong, but the portion ceded is so considerable that it is expected the Anglo-Climese Convention of 1894 will be annulled.

THE Times is informed that the Chinese Government is in a state of helpless confusion, and is incapable of any decisive action or of exercising effective authority.

THE Times, speaking on the Upper Mekong boundary question, approves of the measures taken to affirm the reality of the British Power over Kinnigcheng, the French claim hitherto being baseless and madmissible.

THE only serious difficulty now impeding the retrocession of the Liantung Peninsula to China is due to the attitude of Germany, which does not share in the opposition shown by China, Russia and France to the amount claimed by Jipan as supplementary indeminty. A strong anti-English current is being at present displayed in the German press. Great Britain is accused of finstrating German Colonial aspirations.

JAPAN is making arrangements at Pekin for a commercial treaty with China, the latter securing for Japan the most favoured nation clause, including the right to establish Consular Courts in China.

IT is stated at St. Petersburg that the Egyptian question will be discussed on the opening of the French Parliament, and that an attempt will be made to obtain the British evacuation by united diplomatic steps. It is understood that France, Russia and Turkey will support the movement, and it is hoped that Germany will also joint it.

HERR Bormann, a German official, is about to start for East Africa to consult Major Wissmann regarding the construction of the first section of the Central African Railway. It is hoped he will obtain the sanction of the Reichstag to begin the railway next spring.

As the altinuation which was sent to the rebel Chiefs of the Mymie tribe has been disregarded, an expedition of 400 blue-jackets besides Native auxiliaries and 800 porters, left Zanzibar, on the 15th; for Mombasa to attack Mweli.

THE Emperor of Germany arrived at Lowther Castle on Aug. 11 as the guest of Lord Lousdale. On the 15th he embarked in his yacht for Germany.

PRINCE Francis Ferdinand, the Austrian heir-apparent, is seriously off with lung catarch.

THE return of Prince Ferdinand to Sofia has been made the occasion of a loyalist demonstration against the extreme Russophil party. The military element predominated.

THE Czai has ordered that English shall be taught instead of German in the schools at Tashkend.

THE Times commenting on the protest of the jute industry says the firth is that, however the compening manufacturers may agitate, the great body of English people wish to see fair play for India, and that the Secretary of State realising this, and having courage to act steadfastly thereon, is master of the situation. India will have no cause for complaint if she is given fair play. But fairness is not always for her. She is sometimes sacrificed to party interests.

CHITRAL will not be annexed to Butish India but retained. Such is the decision after months of discussion and deliberation. The opinion of Lord Roberts prevails.

A moderate garrison will be retained in Chitral territory, and arrangements will be made by which the road thither by the Panjkora route will be available for postal purposes, for carriage of supplies, and for tehefs. For the present, at any inte, it will be necessary to keep troops on the Malakand and at the Swat river crossing, but from that point to where the road enters. Cinital territory tribal arrangements will be made.

Two regiments, two monitain batteries, or two guns with two Maxims, will be stationed, while the headquarters will be formed at Kila Drosh

I'wo Native regiments, two guns and two Maxins, with a Native detachment, will hold from Chitral to Kiladrosh, Chitral levies in outamore the line to Dir.

The Khan of Du, with levies, will hold from Dir to Chakdara, and a brig ide on the Marakand, with a battahon at Chakdara, will probably complete the line.

The evacuation of the Jandoul Valley was completed on the 14th without a shot being fired. The Sikhs still hold the enclosure to the west of Panjkora river, but were to move early the day after to Sada, leaving a derichment on the bridge.

Unite Khim's relations have settled on various estates in the Jandoni Vailey

HERR is how an Anglo-Indian contemporary fiets at what he calls the supmeness or apathy of the Indian public to the settlement of the Chitral question.—

"The supmeness of the Iodam public is as uritating as it is irrational. If the voice of the people has a right to be heard upon any matter affecting their welfare, it is surely upon this one. Impenialists who indulge in gluinous paragraphs about the advancement of English presige across the finite of a my cost, should be reminded that it is easy to be reckless of the texts when other people pay them. This matter is being decided by halt-a-dozen men, who are ultimately as little concerned with the effects of their action as the Archbishop of Canterbury. But long after they leave the scene of their mistaken effort, if it comes to pass, the raypet will go hungry oftener because of them, and Iudia a decade behindhand in her development, may look back and thank Loid Elgin's Government for her unprogressiveness. If no action is taken there is little to convince the people of England that Iudia cares much one way or the other, and the views of the Iudian unitiary party so omnipotent in the Government here and so strongly represented in the present Cabinet, will naturally pievail. Many Indian grievances of far less importance have been ventilated by all the most approved methods of modern agitation, but we have yet to hear if a single authorized protest being made against the fatuous and ludicrously wasteful policy which seems to be approaching culmination in Cluttal.

The native press generally has condemned the retention of Chitral. Our contemporary, however, notices with pain that as yet no amborised protest has been made. Truly, the people of India may very well pause before they make such a protest, seeing that their most solemn protests on other questions go for nothing when the Government of the day, Conservative or Liberal, is bent on carrying out its own resolves.

In China the person on whose property the remains of a murdered man are found, is held responsible for the murder till the guilty are discovered. One of the consequences of this strange law is that men sull breathing under ghastly wounds are refused all assistance. Humanity is as much a viithe in China as anywhere, but the Chinese law prevents people from showing their goodness. The officials are as comput as possible. Unable, frequently, to detect the real criminal, they exact round sums of money from persons in whose neighbourhood a crime has been committed. In the early days of British rule in Bengal, some such law of holding the man responsible on whose property a murder was committed was in full force. There was no end of the wrong to which the proprietor was subjected. One of the consequences of this state of things was that people frequently denied ownership and possession of what undoubtedly belonged to them, while others, naire courageons, stepped forward as owners and, after standing the worry of Palice investigations, had their claims universally allowed. Like juheritance, gift, sale and other known methods of transfer of ownership, responsibility freely admitted under such circumstances, sometimes operated to create a title to land. It was thus that the Mookerjees of Janai became owners of several inites of the bed of the Saraswati. A considerable portion of Sibpur on the other side of the river changed hands in the same way. So great was the dread of the police when it proceeded to make an investigation that the markets and shops were all closed. Men and women would not stir out of their homes. Persons, past fifty years of age, if caught by mischance and questioned by the guardians of peace, alleged non-age and refused to answer the simplest queries. The Zemindar's people had actually to levy a tax, called Daroga sciami, for inducing the Police to guit the village.

READ the following '-

"Sn George Campbell represented for many year sa group of burghs in Pathaonent. There was a writy Dean in one of them, who was credited with saying, when Sir George appeared, fresh from his Indian careet, to contest the sear, that 'be had never had any title of the extent of the Indian famine munt he saw Sn George.' Those who remember (and frequenters of the House a few years again are not likely to forger it) the tall, spare figure of the member for the Knikaldy burghs, will appreciate the Dean's Interpoke."

Sir George Campbell was not so gaint when he took charge of the Lieutenaut-Governorship of Bengal. He laboured very hard in the post. It was a rule with him never to go to bed until he hard disposed of all the cases on his table. Constitutionally of a spare though moscular frame, severe toil told on it. Many of Sir George Campbell's successors have been seen to leave Belvedere with the weight of flesh and the hine of health on their cheeks, although they had neither at the time of entering it. The change in Sir Charles Elliott, however, has been most remarkable. He actually links much younger than what he was while Chief Commissioner of Assam or Public Works Munister.

THE Standard of July 26 writes :-

"At the meeting of the Court of Common Council yesterday, the Library Committee brought up a report on the letter of the Bisliop of Stepney asking whether, in the event of the Philological Library of the late Prince Louis Lincen Bonapaire being acquired by public subscription or otherwise, the Corporation would be willing to accept us custody with a view to its preservation in the Guidanil Library. They recommended that the library, if so acquired, should be accepted, and that 330l. should be expended in making certain alterations in the Library for its reception. This was agreed to 1

The Prince's Library has been valued at 6,000 guneas, but it is worth a great deal more, as in some departments, for instance in Bisque, English dialects, Funish and Rimanese, it is perfectly ineque. The movement is due to D., Rass, late librarian of the India Office, at any rate he is assisting as an expert. If the sum is raised and the widow accepts it, she will for that moderate sum render the country in which her husband found a home a most generous and disinterested service. In the Guildhall the books too will be generally accessible.

ONE of the greatest of Sanskrit scholars passed away in Professor Rudolf von Roth. That death has been basely mentioned in the English press. It is race, again. We have much pleasure, therefore, in reproducing from the Athenaum the following obstuary mattice:—

"Prof. Rudolf von Roth, who died at Tubingen in the night from the 22nd to the 23rd of June, after but two days' illness, was born at Sturgart on the 3rd of April, 1821. After matriculating at the University of Tübingen, he passed through the usual course of a student of divinity, but under the fascinating influence of Ewild's teaching soon devoted hinself with ardian to the study of Eastern Linguages, especially Sanskrit and Perstan. Subsequently he spent some time in Paris, Oxford, and London for the purpose of copying and collating Vedic and Zind VISS, and collecting other materials towards the purguit of the hierary researches he had planned out for himself. On his return to Tubingen in 1845, he established himself as a Privatdocent, lecturing on the Hebrew text in the Old Testament and on Sanskrit and Zend. By the publication of his three sectures 'Zur Litteratur and Geschichte des Weda' (1846), containing the first frints of his Vedic studies—an English transtation of which, from the pen of the late Dr. J. Mair, appeared in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal—Rith at once founded a new era in Vedic research. His subsequent works in this field—'Yaska's Nimkia' (1848-22), the 'Atharvaveda,' edited jointly by linnself and Wintney in 1856, and various separate treatises—alt tended to increase and spread his reputation as an expounder of the Veda, and attracted students from all civilized countries to Tubingen to attend his lectures, while his periodical course on the history of religious commanded even larger audiences. The work, however, with which Ruth's name, as the real founder of Vedic philology, will even be intimately connected is the great 'Sanskrit Dictionary' (seven volumes, folio, Si. Petersburg, 1852-75), in which he moderatook the Veda portion and also the medical terins, the remaning classes of Sanskrit words falling to the shaee of his collaborateur, Dr. O. von Boutlingk. As a rehef from his professorial lectures, Roth took a keen interest in local archaelogical researches, t

Though short, it is a very appreciative notice of the great departed. Weber had spoken of him as "the best of all of us." This opinion will find an echo in the heart of every foremost Sanskiit and Zend scholar except perhaps one whose vanity is supreme. A time German professor, he devoted himself to acquisition and dissemination of knowledge without a thought of agggrandising his own wordly prospects. Richly endowed in the head, he had also a noble heart. A combination which made him estimable both as a professor and as a man. India is as much indebted to him as to Professor Max Muller.

THE case against Mr. Ccoft, under the Merchandise Marks Act, was transferred from the Court of the Deputy Migistrate of Sealda to that of the District Magistrate of Alipore. The Pleader for Mr. Ciofi explained that his client had no objection to the nationality of the Deputy Magistrate but that the present case being on all fours with the one already decided by that officer, it was not unreasonable to suppose that he would take a similar view of Mr. Croft's conduct. The Magistrate of the District made over the case to the Joint, Mr. W. B. Thompson, who took it up on Wednesday. Mr. Croft prayed that the hearing might be deferred till after the 28th when his appeal to the District Judge from the order of the Sealda Magistrate would be disposed of. There was no disposition in the Court to grant the adjournment. Application after application was refused. The first objection taken by the Pleader for Mr Crof: was that the present proceedings were untenable while the first conviction was in force, in that the offence now charged to him was practically the same for which he had been convicted. The prosecuting Pleader contended, that if in the course of one transaction several acts were committed and if each of these acts or series of acts constituted an offence by itself, the person or persons committing these different acts might be tried for all the off-oces at one time or at different periods for different offences. The Court agree ng with this interpretation of the law, overruled the first objection. A second objection was made that the records were not in Court. It brought no better result. The hearing then commenced when the third application was filed under section 526 A. of the Criminal Procedure Code for a fortinght's postponement to enable Mr. Croft to move the High Court for transfer of the case. This was a settler. The prosecuting Pleader declared that the section was obligatory. But still be thought there was nothing to prevent the Court from going into evidence if it saw fit to do so. The Court: "You are quite right; but it is not worth while, and so we will not discuss that matter. The case might be transferred to some other Court and have to be heard de novo. I must accept this petition although I think it is merely a dodge to gain time. The case is adjourned to the 30th instant," On the application of the Government Prosecutor, an order was made directing that two bottles from each case be sent for examination by an expert, and on its own motion the Court increased the bail to Rs. 500.

The Agent spoke in highly complimentary terms of the minister. :-"Khan Bihadur Yar Mahonned Khan is an officer of tact, ability and experience, who has already served for eight years as Minister of Jaora and has worked under His Highness the late Nawab with of Jaora and has worked under His Highness the late Nawab with much skill and success. During his administration the debts of the State, which amounted in the year 1885-86, to Rs. 16,60,725-3 have almost been cleared off, while many improvements in the general administration of the State have been established.

We also hear good accounts of the minister from other quarters, Khan Bahadur Yar Mahamed Khan is a son of the late minister of the State and is related to the Prince. He had been on the Berar Commission and his travelled in Europe.

The Governor-General's Agent concluded saying —

THE fifth Judge of the Calcutta Small Cause Court, Mr. Abul Hassan, has, it seems, no judicial temper. He has been called upon by the Chief Magistrate to answer a charge of assault on one Abdul Aziz, a dealer in hule, whom, it is alleged, on little or no provocation, he abused in language most offensive to a Mahomedan, whom he caught by the mape of his neck and struck with his clenched fist near the left temple and went on repeating the assault till rescued by Mr. Sulman, a barrister. Dealers in hide are not the men to bear an affront so meekly. Oftentimes they are aggressively offensive to their customers, Enropeans not excepted. The prestige of a Small Cause Court. Judge must be great indeed !

We are truly sorry for Su Donshaw, Manickjee, Petit, At his age, the death of the son who was to succeed to his baronetcy is a terrible blow. He has had three sons. The first, Cowasjee, died in 1878. The second, Fromjee, is just dead, and the third, Boursojee, is ailing. In death, as in life, the Paisees are lavishly liberal. At the third day ceremony of the death, the Petit family subscribed Rs. 4,03,000 to local channes. Su Diishaw gave away half a lakh, two and half laklis being charged to the estate of the deceased.

On the 5th August, the Officiating Lieutenaut-Governor of the N-W. Provinces laid the foundation stone of the Meetit witer works. The feature of these works is that the engines will be worked not by steam, but by water power. The Gauges Canal will be utilized for the purpose.

THE Chinese Commissioner not having entered appearance and the season being advanced for work at high altitudes, orders are to be issued for immediate return of the Sikkim Tibet Boundary Commission. The demarcation of the Eastern Pamir region is, however, being pushed on. The Amn's agent reached the camp on Lake Victoria on July 27 and next day the first boundary pillar was fixed

THE jury having found them guilty, the Sessions Judge of Dacca sentenced two youthful Mahomedans, for a horrible outrage on a Mahomedan gul of 16, to seven years' transportation.

Two sensational murders or rather one murder and one massacre the first in the Suburbs and the second in the town, are reported this week. In Bhawampore, a Mahumedau who had only four months married a girl of 11, cut her thront at hight when sleeping to prevent her from remaining with her parents whom he suspected of immoral designs on his wife. He had wanted to remove her but there was objection from the parents. To make an end of all his doubts, he put an end to his innocent girl wife. This reminds us of Nobin's murder of his wife Elokasi-to save her chastity and his honour,

The other is a more ghastly tale. A Bengah, aged about forty, respectably connected, named Annadaprosad Ghose, ran amuck and dangerously wounded three of his own suns and two of his brothers-in-law. His grandfather Ramkinnai Ghose came from Bamanpara, in the Howrah Sub-division of the Hooghly district, and settled in Calcutta. He had two sons, the elder of whom Duorga Churn, of a domineering spirit, separated from the father. He was book-keeper to Messis, Gladstone Wyllie & Co., and left a little fortune at his death 20 years back. He had two wives, the first of whom still lives. She bearing him no son, he, pining for a male heir, took another wife, and after fasts and feasts to Brahman and various other religious rites was at last blessed with a son, the hero of the tragedy. The father's delight knew no bounds when another son was born of the same wife. Happily, she is also dead. Doorga Churn at his death left a little fortune. The heirs-at-law could not agree. They went to law and divided the patrimony. Annada, like his father, has no sweet temper and always ill-treated his wife. A spendthrift, he expended himself in every way. He losing all and growing more cruel to the wife, she removed herself with her children to her father's. There he pursued her and made himself a terror to that household. He was not allowed admittance. This made him furious. Aiming himself with deadly weapons, he, at dead of night, climbed into the room where his children were sleeping, backed three of them and stabbed two of his brothers-in-law who came to their rescue. He had meditated the murder of his wife also. She, however, escaped. She has been a patient wife and a good angel to him But for her he would have been brought to trouble long before

THERE seems to be a fatality about the wills of eminent Bengalis, Even when drafted with sufficient one, the wishes of the testators are somehow circumvented Everybody knows how the will of Raja Kristonath of Cossonbazar, by which that unfortunate young nobleman had devoted the whole of his splendid property to the educational needs of Bengal, was frustrated by the genius of a Brahman lawyer, Hara Chandra Lahiri of Sejampore. The hen-at-law succeeded to the property which Government wished to administer either as exccutor if the will held good, or appropriate as its own under the English law against suicide. But it must be admitted that the a immistration of the estate by the holder has always been for the public good. For there is not another Raja or Ram in Bengal who has been more lavish with her wealth than Maharani Surnamoye. To omit many other wills of millionaires, the next will that was set aside was the famous one of Bibu Prosanno Coomar Tagore. The heir-at-law had been disinherited. In the clearest possible language the restator had declared that his only son would take nothing under the will. Prosanno Coomer bunself was no mean lawyer, and had consulted not only ing with the preliminary passing of the B.A. examination, all the foremost counsel of his day but also some of his friends among the Judges of the Bengal High Court. The next will whose material provisions have been circumvented is that of Pundit Iswara Chunder Vidyasagar. This will may not be famous for the property dealt by it, but no one confdeny that the testator houself was one of the greatest of philanthropists that Bengal has produced. His life is indelibly written in the history of Bengali literature and also in the educational history of his country, Pundit Vidyasagar, like the Tagore Baboo, bad disinherited his only son. Some of his friends, however, who were mable to move him while alive, joined together after his death in frustrating his deliberate wishes. Influential meetings were held after the Pundit's death for perpetuating his memory. Nobody, however, seemed to care how the deceased philanthropist was treated in the matter of his will. With great difficulty the will was proved. Even this would not have been done but for the single-minded exertions of Mi, W. C. Bonnerjee. Some of the witnesses to the document endeavoured to behave towards the testator who had placed his faith in them as men behave towards a dead hon. Out of the three executors named in the will, one had predeceased the testator; one refused to act; so the document was proved by only one of them. After probate was granted by the High Court, the property, we understand, pissed over to the disinherited heir. To the public at large it matters little who enjoys the property left by Pundit Vidyasagar, although it is impossible not to feel some pity for frustration of his plans after death. The matter, however, does not test liere. The testator had established a Higher Class English School at his native village of Businga, called after his mother, "The Bhagavan Vidyalayn," His will contains a bequest of Rs. 100 per month in aid of this institution. We regret to learn that the school is in its downward comise towards extinction. To e two higher classes have been dismissed, and the institution reduced to the rank of what is called "Middle Class English School," It is time, we think, that Sir Alfred Croft turned his special attention to the school, to preserve, if possible, a monument of the founder's philanthropy, who has done so much for education in Bengal. The Busing School is, again, as much a public property as the Metropolitan Institution, The desecration of the one has been prevented. Why should not the other be saved?

A MAHOMEDAN VIEW OF ANGLO-ISLAM-IC JOURNALISM IN BENGAL.

THE equestion has often been asked-Have the Mahomedans of India any newspaper in English which can be strictly called their own-an organ which represents their views correctly and authoritatively on subjects relating to their community? Although repeatedly asked, it has never been answered in the affirmative. There is unfortunately no such representative organ, recognized in all quarters as the true exponent of the views and wants of the Mahomedan community, or which the public can look to for authoritative opinion and reliable information on Mahomedan questions, political, social, or educational. Bengal, which is considered as the most advanced province in the country, where the Mahomedan population is very large, and where there are scores of Mahomedan graduates in every large city, has not yet been able to produce any English newspaper for the Mahomedans which fulfils half the conditions laid down.

The next question which suggests itself is, Why is there not a national organ or true representative paper conducted in a manner consistent with the importance, dignity and literary fame of the community and able to hold its own against English newspapers conducted by the Bengalees or the Parsees?

The explanation usually given is that the Mahomedans are very poor, and for want of sufficient funds they cannot start a respectable and able paper which would meet the requirements of the community. It is also alleged that the existing journals can hardly pay their own expenses, and that they have to devise various means to keep them going. Sometimes compassionate appeals are made to the rich of the community for aid to the socalled national organ, and not unoften the well-to-do are obliged to contribute their mite to this national fund. Officials too have been known to interest themselves in the cause.

When papers under the editorial management of Bengalees, Parsees and Europeans are largely subscribed by Mahomedans, there is no reason why a Mahomedan paper conducted ably on proper lines should not succeed and prosper under the patronage and liberality of its own community. Such a paper would also be equally welcome to other nationalities-Hindus, Parsees, Europeans and all. A newspaper is usually a trading concern and its success depends upon its management. For a national paper and particularly when that nation is much behind the times in education and general progress, there must always be an editor belonging to the same community with a real carnestness of purpose, genuine sympathy, entire devotion, and special sources of information. It is also essential that he should know Arabic and Persian, and be well informed in all Mahomedan matters. Such men, however, are rare in that community. The half a dozen men who come up to the ideal are better employed in other spheres and cannot be expected to take charge of a concern which does not pay. European, Eurasian and Hindu Editors of Mahomedan journals have been tried, here and elsewhere, and they have not succeeded, because they did not know the subjects with which they were to deal, nor could they have any real sympathy with the community whose paid advocates they were.

The Mahomedans themselves are to blame for this state of things. They can talk a good deal and live beyond their means. They can be proud of not understanding Bengalee but they shew no real taste for English literature or their own. Among hundreds of Mahomedan graduates there is not any man in Bengal, except perhaps Mr. Justice Amir Ali, who has written any book m English worth perusal on any important or interesting subject. There are hardly three Mahomedans in Bengal who have ever contributed anything to any of the daily and weekly papers or magazines which attracted public notice. Vernacular journalism in Bengal among Mahomedans is equally lamentable. There is not one Urdu paper worthy of note Not one Mahomedan graduate is engaged in conducting any such paper. Not one graduate is qualified to write Urdu correctly and ably. Why this dearth? Because the Mahomedans after leaving college hid farewell to all books. They only seek Government employment or run to the Bar where the chances are not always good. They do not understand the true value of knowledge. They cannot appreciate independent profession. They do not seek knowledge for its own sake. They do not think for a moment what good a man can do to his community by his pen if he knows how to wield it. If some Mahomedan graduates, under-graduates, or other students had devoted themselves to improving their journalism, it would have paid them better and at the same time

done good to the community

Unless some persons make literature their profession, there is little hope of a qualified Mahomedan editor and a well conducted respectable journal. Editors who cannot distinguish between Persian prose and poetry, cannot be expected to do the duty of an editor of a Mahomedan journal.

If the Mahomedans want to better their political position and protect their interests, they must wake up from their deep slumber. No amount of tall talk and pride of past glory will raise them in the scale of nations and help them in keen competition in these hard days. The only way to prepare them for the contest is to start some good vernacular and English journals. Some patriotic and high-minded Mahomedans ought to take to the profession of journalism and devote their lives to the social and political welfare of the communi-ty. There are hundreds of subjects of vital interest to that community, but how few of them are taken up or properly dealt with by the existing Mahomedan journals! This neglect can only be due to ignorance or incompetence.

The half dozen Urdu journals which are published in Bengal and Behar, are not worth the paper on which they are printed. They are a disgrace to the community whom they profess to represent. The Mahomedans of these Provinces ought to blush at these miserable rags. They bode no good to the present generation of educated Maho-medans in Bengal. On the contrary, they raise doubts whether the graduates themselves are well versed in Urdu or Persian. The present writer has known Mahomedan examiners in those languages selected by the Syndicate of the Calcutta University, who cannot speak Urdu as decently as any Khid-matgar of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad, It is strange that many who foolishly hate Bengalee do not know Urdu or know it less than Bengalee.

Letter to the Editor.

THE LORD'S SONG.

Sir, -- I have read with interst your review of Mrs. Annie Besant's new translation of the Gud, It undoubtedly possesses many merits. At the same time, it is not free from errors of rendering. Verse 12 of the Eleventh Lesson is really a crux to European scholars. Even Mr. Davis, who is generally very accurate and whose English translation of the Gud is regarded to have supplanted the earlier versions of Thompson and Gladwin, and which is in some respects better than Telang's in the Sacred Books of the East edited by Professor Max Müller, has not been able to render the verse correctly. The original is, > Kalosmi lokakshayakrit, Pravriddho lokan samahartumiha pravrittah, Ritepi tvam na bhavishynti saurve Yevasthitah pratyanikeshu yodhah.

Correctly rendered, the verse would read, " I am Time, the destrover of the worlds. Swelling with might, I am now engaged in destroying all creatures! Even without thee, all these warriors that stand in the several divisions, with cease to be !"

What Krishna wishes to say is that the warriors assembled together in Kurukshetra would all be destroyed even if Arjung refused to slay them. Sreedhara, in his gloss, explains,

"Rit tvam hautaram vina," i. e., without thee acting as a slayer. Sankara also explains,---" Ritapi Vinapi," &c.

Now read Mrs. Besant's version :

" Time am I, laying desolate the world, Made manifest on earth to slav mankind ! Not one of all these warriors ranged in strife Escapeth death; thou shalt alone survive."

The error is as gross as the one pointed out in the

THE INSANITATION OF CALCUTTA.

THE HEALTH OFFICER'S ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE GENERAL COMMITTEE ON AUGUST 10.

Question .-- Will the Health Officer be good enough to inform the Commissioners whether he is aware of the existence of any special cause or causes, which have lately rendered the condition of Calcutta "highly insanitary" beyond, of course, the original defects in the construction of the sewage system? If so, when did he draw the attention of the Commissioners to the same and what were his recommendations for the removal or mitigation thereof.

Answer.---I am not aware of the occurrence of any special cause or causes of a new character tending to render the conditions of Calcutta more insanitary lately than in previous years; nor do I think in analysing the development of the diseases which have recently prevailed in Calcutta are there to be found any strikingly new features which would render the existence of such causes probable. The unusual mortality and sickness in Calcutta were due to the great prevalence of small-pox and of fevers. As re-gards small-pox its epidemiology is characterised by a periodicity which manifests itself every 4 or 5 years in almost all unvaccinated and overcrowded centres of population. This has been the exper-ence of Calcutta ever since statistics have been recorded. The origin of the periodicity and the causes which give rise to the severity of the disease in particular years have not yet been elucidated by

With reference to fevers, although there was a large increase last year, a tendency to increase has been observed since 1889. The figures are as follows:---

Year.	-	Deaths.		Ratio
1889	•••	3,307		7.7
1890		4,112	•••	9.4
1891	•••	4,614		10.2
1892	•••	4,593		10.5
1893		4,713		10.7
1804		5.667		120

From these figures it will be seen that as regards the production of the rise in fevers, there are causes continuously at work in Calcutta, and that there is no occasion to look for special causes for an explanation. Of the permanent conditions rendering Calcutta insanitary ation. Of the permanent conditions rendering Calcutta insanitary the most important is certainly that mentioned by the Commissioner, orz., the detective condition of the sewerage, a condition which I pointed out from the first year I had the opportunity of examining the sanitary condition of Calcutta.

Question.—Of the several epidemics to which Calcutta is periodically subject, will the Health Officer kindly state those which have recently recurred with greater frequency and increasing severity?
what is the total number of deaths from such diseases in each during 1891 and 1894, and the percentage thereof, in relation to the population?

Answer.-The deaths and death-rates from fever and small-pox are to be seen in the following table:---

From the table (which is omitted here) it appears that in the Town Area deaths from fever in 1891, 1892, 1893 and 1894 were respectively 4,614; 4,593; 4,713; and 5,667; the ratios being 10.5; 10.7 and 12.9. Deaths from small-pox during the same period wete 13; 16; 13; and 3,46: the ratios being '02; '03; '02 and 74. Comparing the fever statistics of the town with those of the suburbs. we find the ratio of the town which is sewered fast approaching the ratio of the suburbs which is undrained, the ratios being now respectively 12:9 and 14:3.

Of other epidemics the cholera ratio was high in 1891, the year of the 'Ardhadoya Jog,', when the deaths amounted to 2,955, but since then it has been below the average. There have been no other epidemics.

Question .-- Will the Health Officer kindly lay before the Commissioners statistics showing the total number of deaths from typhus and typhoid fevers in each year during 1891 to 1894, and specifying the localities in which these occurred? Answer .- There were no cases of typhus fever recorded between 1891 and 1894. Of typhoid fever, there were 7 deaths in 1891, responsibility of the works, and inspect periodically their progress 4 in 1892, 8 in 1893 and 6 in 1894. A large proportion of these until they are finished. 4 in 1894. 8 in 1893 and 6 in 1894. A large proportion of these were reported from the Calcutta Hospitals. The Commissioners will observe that these numbers refer to mortality and not to sickness; and if there has been any increase of cases, the disease Question Is the Health Officer aware of the existence of the plague in China referred to in the letter of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to the Local Government, dated 10th July, 1895. What are the characteristics of the disease? How does it originate and how is it propagated? Is there any reasonable probability of the plague breaking out in the city in the near future? If so, has the Heath Officer drawn the attention of the Commissioners and the public to the matter, and when?

mice, &c., take the infection and probably propagate the disease. During the outbreak in Hongkong, Kitasato, a Japanese Physician and Scientist, and Y'hersin, a French Physician and Scientist, discovered a microbe which they proved to be the cause of the disease. The plague remains in a latent state in China, and from time to time acquires exceptional activity from causes which are unknown. It spreads from locality to locality, probably by human intercourse, and in this respect the fact is important that the period of incubation is usually about 7 days and probably not longer than 12. Accordingly, one of the most effective measures for protecting Indian ports discant about three weeks from China, consists in medical inspection and a quarantine and disinfection of suspected and infected vessels. At the time of the prevalence of plague in Hongkong, I discussed the necessary measures with the Health Officer of the Port, and these were put into practice by the orders of the Lieutenant-Governor. The disease is slow in travelling, has not a long period of incubation, and Calcutta is a three week's voyage from China, so that with precautions to the inspection and disinfection of ships arriving from infected ports in China, there is a very little probability of the plague breaking out in the curvain the near future. As regards the susceptibility of the for protecting Indian ports distant about three weeks from China, city in the near future. As regards the susceptibility of the disease in Hongkong in the different races, the following order was noted :-- Chinese, Japanese, Hundus from India, Malays, Jews, Parsees and English.

Question .-- In his opinion what precantions other than those as ciated with prarique should be taken to guard the Metropolis against the breaking out of the plague? Has he made any recommendations to the Commissioners for the adoption of those precautions? If so, when ; if not, why not?

Answer .- Every one knows that quarantine is a measure of only relative efficacy, and if once the plague should be admitted either by land or water, the conditions in Calentia would render it an easy prev to its ravages. It is against these conditions that the necessary measureseshould be pressed on, and I enumerated these measures in detail in the report for the first quarter of this year. Of these conditions the most important are overcrowding and pollution of the soil. The distribution of the inhabitants of a town are beyond the direct The distribution of the innaments of a control of a Municipality, and can only be influenced by regulating the distribution of the houses. This, in every town, is effected by the Municipality armed with an efficient Building Act, of by the Municipality armed with an efficient Building Act.
As regards the pollution of the soil, Mr. Baldwin Latham showed that the outfall of the Calcutta sewerage was obstituted by tidal influences, that the sewers were sewers of deposit, that they leaked into the subsoil, and that there was a constant interchange between the sewage, rainfill and subsoil water. That a number of the sewers leak has been proved by uncovering them for inspection; that the soil is polluted has been determined by analysis; that the subsoil water is contaminated has been ascertained by the analysis of the water of wells; so that this condition of affairs produces a sort of Goragacha throughout Calentia. Since Mr. Baldwin a sort of Goragacha thoughout Calentra. Since Mr. Dalawin Latham's visit to Calcutta, I have, in every Annual Report, drawn special attention to the argency of carrying out his recommendations, and the dager of delay which is now demonstrated from the tact that there were nearly 1,000 more deaths in 1894 from towers than in 1893, and the increase during the 6 months of the year has been nearly 900 compared with the corresponding season of last year.

The only means in my opinion to obviate in an efficient and sitisfactory manner this state of affairs, is to take immediate steps to invite an expert of the experience of Mr. Baldwin Latham to visit Calcutta to draw up the designs for the necessary works, more specially with reference to the outfall of the city, to plan the suburban drainage and set the works in motion under a Superintending Drainage Engineer; and further to appoint this expert as Consulting Engineer, so that he may have complete charge and

I believe it is only by reduction of overcrowding by a Building Act and by immediate and radical measures in regard to the purification of the soil both in the rown and snouths that it is possible to secure a proper remedy for the present state of things W. J. Simpson, M.D.,

SIR W. W. HUNTER ON EDUCATION OF INDIAN WOMEN.

HIS SPEECH AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL INDIAN ASSOCIATION IN AID OF SOCIAL PROGRESS AND EDUCATION IN INDIA.

Sir W. W. Hunter, K.C.S.L., said: My Lords, ladies and gentlemen--The Council have asked me to submit the following resolution to the meeting: "That this meeting, recognising the increas ing desire for education among Indian women, and appreciating the efforts already made by the National Indian Association to meet the demand, earnestly trusts that the public will generously support this important part of the Association's work." The Council wish me, in laying the motion before you, to say a few words in regard to the exact position of the Association towards female education in India, and to state to you our immediate reasons for making this appeal. The question which will occur to many of you is this: Is there any serious ground for asking the public to help us in our work? Now, first, as regirds our exact position towards femile education. We have heard some admirable remarks from Lord Harris as to the work done by the Association with the view of bringing Indians and Europeans together. We have also had from Sir Charles Crosthwaite a locid narrative of the early failure and more recent success of the movement for female education in the North Western Provinces. I, therefore, pass from State efforts, but before saying what I have to say I should like to heartily recognise the great services which have been rendered by the missionary bodies towards female education in India. The missionaries have been the pioneers of all education in India -- of education for the highest as for the lowest classes, and especially for the women of India. The result is now becoming apparent, A generation of educated Indian women, few in numbers at present but full of Promise for the future, has grown up.

Yon will find that almost all these educated women of India who have made their mark in our day were name Christians, or were colucated under missionary influence. The result is no doubt an hononrable one for missionary enterprise; but how does it strike the natives of India? Take the list of these women of mark; take Toru Dutt, the distinguished poetess of Bengal, or Mis. Sathianadhan, the novelist of Madras. whose works are so racy of the soil; or take the distinguished women whose memons form the subject of Mrs. Chapman's most interesting book. Almost without exception they are the product of missionary education. Now, as Lord Harris has explained and as Sir Charles Crosthwaite has enforced, temale education appears to Indian men in a thi-atening light. Femilieducation, in the opinion of many of them, means not only a social revolution but a religious revolt. Female education is in part the product of a desire for better tings amongst the natives of India, but chiefly hitherto of evangelising in theness foreign to them. I put it to you, ladies and gentlemen, supposing a system of education were introduced into this country from without a system of which we had some apprehension : supposing that system were munitained among our girls by the missionaries of a foreign religion, let us say of the Hindu religion, or of the Buddhist religion, or even of the Roman Carbol's religion, what a sense of fear would it spread among our English

Now, why have the missionaries had this--I will not say monopoly---but this immense share in female education. It is because the State finds it extremely difficult to interfere in the matter. At one time it was my duty to visit the female schools throughout the various Provinces of India, in order to draw up a scheme for extending education. I found when I had written the chapter on female education in the Report of the written the chapter on female education in the Report of the Commission that it was a mere chapter of difficulties. It we not a chapter of how to do it, but of the difficulty of doing it. That difficulty remains to this day. The State, a Lori Harris has very properly gaid, can interfere only very charily in the matter. What agency then can take its place, and so dissociate female education from the idea of a religious revolt in the Hindu mind? It is the agency of sympathetic but unsectarian private effort. Phat agency has many workers among the natives of India themselves---native workers from His Highthe natives of India themselves--native workers from His Highably explained what is sheing done in that kingdom; to the Maharaja of Mysore, the good and noble young prince whose loss we have so recently had to deplore, but whose place is taken in Bengal and in the North West Provinces, as we have just heard, by other men of rank equally decirons of advancing the condition of their country-women. There is a noble native agency at this moment at work in India, but like most native agencies at present it requires encouragement, guidance, and support from England. That guidance and that support and support from England. That guidance and that support the National Indian Association endeaveurs to give. The National Indian Association takes the women of India as they are. It does not seek to destroy their religion. It accepts the basis of existing institutions, and it merely tries to render the women of India more intelligent companions as the wives of educated hasbands, and more intelligent mathers for educated children. It aims to effect for the tennal: mind in India what Lady Dufferin's splendid enterprise does with regard to their physical needs. It is the true complement of the work which is being carried on by Lady Dufferin's Fund, and, alas! on a scale infinitely below its requirements.

The men of India are advancing hand over hand. We are creating a new race of men whose future it is impossible to prediet; hat while the men are going forward the women hang behind; and a man when he marries finds himself belonging to one century and wedded to a century far back. That is our position towards female education in India. Sir Charles Crosthposition towards female cutocation in India. Sir Charles Crosthwate came lefore you able to say that he had to ask for no money. I am in a less fortunate position, for I have to explain that we do need money. Education is nowhere (especially, at starting) self supporting. I suppose in no country in the world is female education more valued than here among us. Go to Cambridge and you will see Girton and Newtham; go to Oxford and you will see Lady Margaret's Somerville and St. Hugh's--very fine buildings, noble institutions; but how built and how supported? Are they built by the parents of the students, or as commercial speculations? Are they even supported by those who profit by them? Certainly dot. They rupported by those who profit by them? Certainly not. They were built by outside help, and they are maintained by outside help. Therfore, in asking for outside help towards the education of the women of India, this Association is making no novel demand, but making a demand which has been again and again made for the women of England themselves.

These institution at Oxford and Cambridge almost always due.

These institutions at Oxford and Cambridge almost always date from some pious founder. Well, we, too, date from a pious foundress--Miss Mary Carpenter. Miss Mary Carpenter was not only our pious foundress, but she was our chief, I was going to say, our only benefactress. What she was our chief, I was going to say, our only benefactress. What she wanted to see done was this. She did not desire any new departure (the danger of which Lord Harris has pointed out); what she desired was to see the work, which native gentlemen of India were themselves taking up, helped and guided by sympathetic and from England.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, what practical form does out aid take? It provides, first, scholarships; second, home teaching; third, assistance to schools; and fourth, the training of teachers, and training schools for young Hindu vadows. We have heard and training schools for young Hindu widows. We have heard from Lord Harris, and in Lady Harris's almirible note, the work that has been done in Bombay. Indeed, the first article in out Magazine for May deals with female education in Bombay very interesting manner. Madras has always been in the torefront of our work, and in speaking of Madras I should like to say a word, in which I am sure you will all join me- a word of sorrow for the death of one of the most devoted educationalists or sorrow for the death of one of the most devol-4 educationalists that ever went from this country to India. The loss of Mr. Grigg, formerly Director of Public Instruction in Madras, leaves a blank in our system of education, and throws a most serious responsibility upon those who now have to carry on the work, which he and Mrs. Grigg so long carried on, of itmale education of Madras. m Madras.

I will take only one Presidency of India and a single example of our work in iter-our Widows' Home in Bengal. That is not a Christian institution, but an institution maintained by a Brahman ... Mr. Sasipada Banerji and his wife. This lady and gentleman ...M1. Sasipada Banerji and his wife. This lady and gentleman have a hoose outside Calcutta, which, under the ampices of our Calcutta Bianch, they have turned into an Institution of unique interest. It is not only a day school for girls, with 128 pupils attending it, but it is also a training school—a normal college you may call it, for the training of teachers, and also a home for widows. Some 19 Hinda widows are boarded in the house and are being trained to useful professions; 25 have already left the Home and are helping to instruct others.

These poor women who have bitherto been denied any rôle in life nees poor women who have nuturers been denied any rote in life are being qualified for a useful career. There are 14 other boarders, many of them of high caste, and two of them little girls who have heen deserted by their high caste husbands. In this Institution you have many varieties of educational work. You have little girls to the number of 128 in the school-rooms ; you have the boarders, 33 in number, learning to become teachers : among them 19 wide receiving a new career in life. Mr. Banerji has also a large sphere of usefulness in the country around him with 14 district centres. To each of these 14 centres he sends either an educated widow or a Hindu lady teacher, and in each of them there is a group of homes who subscribe for these ladies' teaching. In this way a real but non-destructive education is brought within the reach of a number of our fellow subjects in that part of India. If we could help this institution sufficiently, it would double its work within three years. If we had only funds we could establish institutions of the kind in every Province of India.

There is a demand in India for education for girls, but for a constructive education—not a revolutionary education or one destructive of their religion. Until we have satisfied that demand we can never say that we have satisfied the claims of India upon our philanthropic zeal. I should like to mention a single case to show how our Wistows' Home in Bengal practically works. One Child was left a widow at the age of 5 % years. She has been nearly 7 years in the Home and her mother, herself a young widow, came to wears in the frome and ner mother, nesen a young whose, came to the Home with her: I think the mother's age was 14 or 15 when her husband died. They learnt out of the same book, and the mother is now a teacher in the school. That single story illustrates the pathetic opportunities which constantly present themselves. Therefore, ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to help us, and I ask the public outside to help us, not to create a revolutionary education in India, but to aid in our efforts to establish a true female education on an unsectatian basis and upon non-destructive principles.

STARVED INTO MUTINY.

STARVED INTO MUTINY.

A FAMOUS mutiny on shipboard came to pass in this way: When the ship, which had sailed from London, was well down the Channel, it was found that the provisions intended for the dee of the crew were totien and, of course, uncatable. The men complained to the captain, who promised to put into into some near port and exchange the bad stores for good. He failed to keep his word, and as the poor sailors couldn't sail the ship 10,000 inles on empty stomachs, they killed the captain and mate, helped themselves to the cabin provisions, held high paks for a few weeks, and finally southed the ship, put off in the boads, and were all lost but three. The captain could have prevented all this if he had chosen to; but perhaps the awares and he had put up the bad jub on the men. Very likely, and got served out for it. They were both criminals and fools.

But there are ships that most needs sail to the end of the voyage were buth criminals and fools.

But there are ships that most needs sai to the end of the voyage with only the original stores. Come what may, they can't go back or put min any port. Some are well found and others badly; and so voyages differ.

put min any port. Some are well found and others badly; and so voyages differ.

To mondy the illustration, the latter kind of vessels are human beings. At birth we sail on a voyage, which by rights cught to be security years long. But how many of us continue on the Sea of Life that long? Very few compriatively. Most of us go down sooner. Why? Because we recklessly, carelessly, or ignorably waste the stock of wital force with which Nature entows us at the start. There are no meat shops or bikeries on the Atlantic, nor are there any places after birth where we can beg or by more "iffe." This is perfectly plan to me. Is it plan to you? I am aft and it tsn't. Let's see whether a little incident will timb light on it.

Mr. Henry Fish had been a fortunate man. His furbears had done well by him. Up to the Automn of 1890 he could say, "I have always been strong and healthy." For thirty years he had worked as a painter for one emplayer. He must have been not only a healthy man, loud good punter. So far his "vinality," his constitution, had been equal to all demands on it. It had endiried a lot of hard work, resisted the weather, and digested his food. Then it telused to go on. It struk work. It wouldn't make sail in pull an oar. In plain English the symptoms or signs of the nouble were these: Loss of appetite, bad taste in the mouth, terrible pains infer eating, yellow eyes and skin, and rheomatic gour in the feet. His legs and stomach became fearfully swillen, and his heart palpitated and thimped flightfully rearly all the time. On account of the distress given him by solid food he could only eat sloys, and out much strength can be got out of them.

By-and-by the best he could on was to hubble about on cractices He could not be about at all, pecanse he couldn't daw his breath when young down. Far over a month he smackled what sleep he could when

By-and-by the best he could on was to mode about on concise the could not be abed at all, because be couldn't draw his breath when lying down. Far over a month he snatched what sleep he could when supported upright on his crutches. Just think of that, and be thankful it wasn't your cise. He wasn't able to lift his hand to his mouth, and had to be mused might and day. He gut so low (in spite of doctors attending him) that he didn't expect to live, and sidn't desire to. One attending lim) that he didn't expect to live, and sidn't desire to. One doctor and he had heart disease, and that his heart was big as a professional nurse from a convalencent home. When he had sank so how as to make it a wonder how he kept able at all, he first head of the medicine which finally cured him. In concluding his letter he says, "After beginning to take Mother Seigel's Curaive Symp I never looked behind me. I got stringer every day, and have aided nothing since. This medicine sived my life, and I want the public to know in (Signed) Henry Fish, Great Malvern, County of Worcester, January 12th, 1803; 12th. 1803;

Only a word more. We spoke of men and women being like ships that have to sail to the end of the voyage with what supplies they store with. By that we mean, not supplies of food, but supply of power to digest food. You see the difference? Bread and meat are un benefit han lead and leather if you can't digest them. In Mr. Fish's case it was not food that failed, but power to use it. He had indigestion and dyspepara. The worderful remedy discovered by Mother Segel stopped the waste of virality caused by the disease, and enabled Nature to use food to build up the periating body. He will now proceed, we hope, towards the port of Old Age, with favouring winds.

Yet, save for timely rescue, he would doubtless have gone down, as milhous do, leaving but a momentary eddy over the spot where they disappear.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH:

THE THOUGHTS AND FEFLINGS WHICH LED HIM TO PROPOSE

HIS SCHEME CONCERNING EL DORADO.

Schne—The tower, with a lattice that does not admit a view of the rising or selting sun.

'I is long since I have seen the pilgrim-sun Gird up his garments for the dusky day, His locks wieathed tight about his decent brow : "I is long since I have seen them shaken out Upon his shoulders - when the modest youth Reels to his couch, like tired Bacchanal; The rich clouds hanging glory round his path. But something I can see-the comely mann, With well-filled horn, shines in a summer sky That grows not dark till morn !-now like a bow Drawn by aënal archer-yon bright star, An arrow that hath parted from the string, Is on its way-and now she is a bark Ploughing a summer sea, so calmly blue ! Such as round fairy islands of the west Flows breathlessly. Ah! that such bark were mine. This pison, smaller than a cabin, hath No such sweet progress; in its aims we sleep For aye forgotten as in Death's small crib. Its profitless confinement bears not onward ! Hark ! there are merry tones of children round me, Music that steals as from the gate of heaven To hell's deep womb-huge fireworks that mimic Those strange appearances by Genn wrought Amid autumnal clouds-cities in flame, And men that fight and die. You coloured lamps Outrival dew-drops of the marn, or gems Deep in the earth. Oh! that I could wring out From demon-miners treasures hid in vain, Like love in the sick hearts of pallid nuns. Could I but bear some here, forgiveness, fame, Might dance around me-better far than these, Action, that tide that stirs the stagnant blood-Courage that thrown upon a dung-heap mounts Once more its fiery horse. What do I here? I have schooled my boiling thoughts, and learnt and taught What meek-eyed sages tell, with rocky brow, And hearts that beat calm as an infant's breath-I had given back my birthright, but for whom? Not to the winds-not to thee, marble death !

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deafurss, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VITORIA CHAMBERS, 19. SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

Yet thou hast trampled on it-thou hast rent The precious cincible in which 't was poured ; Thou hast enclosed within a narrow tomb A spirit linked with mine Six months ago And I was busy as a clerk could be Conning the golden past, whence fancy mounts, And feeding for his roots a noble stream -Now 'tis a river locked within a cave, Having no egress. Now I weave no more The mingled web of acts and lessons wise. Six months ago, and he was like a bee, Sucking in nectar from the flowers that lay Opening beneath my sun, and giving back The honey of sweet plaise, and dealer love. And dearest sympathy. I was to him A lofty hill, around whose storm-swept peaks His thoughts like clouds might gather ;-he is gone-I was not near to soothe his dying head . And yet my cordials, drawn from many an herb, Sedulously sought in days of liberty. On home and foreign shares, relieved thy pain The very hour before thy soul took flight, Sweet noble prince! who even so early learnt The combat between subject, filial love, And sense of right-a royal love of greatness. The serpent breeds the eagle, and some say It stang him too -may God forgive the thought ! Sweet moon, thou'rt shining as thou shou'st that night Upon his torch-lit funeral-lighting now His sister's bridal train on follows quick -The nation's tears are dry -- ny will of grief Is what it wis. My land, too, it is gone. The scenes of pleasures sweet, and graceful toil -My walks and stately trees, given to a thing Polluting what it crawls o'er; and I begged, I sent my gentle wife to beg in vain-That his fair dawn might not be clouded o'er With such a veil -that his free hand might priise Ere it cut down the old paternal tree, Yielding its from to feed my little ones,

(His wife enters)

My own Elizabeth I the time seems long. That thou hast left me -wert thou gazing down. Upon this pageant cry—dost thou, too, Forget the grave, and bim who sleeps therein? My thoughts have ranged over all past, all future;—I thought ou thee, when for thy sake the first. I sleept within a prison's walls, and knew. Its gloomy leisure, and of our sweet babe. That, like a flower in a dark cavern, cheered. The blackness of the place—and of this king, A sterner master in his boyishness.

Thou, my dear, wilt hve With our young poet René-let bim dream Of glorious cities, and untrodden seas, And beauteous monsters-only named so, Because their forms, like augels, are not known ; And let him hang above thee as a bow Over the Autumn woods, whose changing leaf Hath glory, beauty, tenderness, not seen In their rich prime. Now leave me, my beloved. I write a letter, worded cautiously. To this royal pedant, hung with golden phrase Of wealth, to tempt his pleasure and his pride I

JAPAN is on the highway to fame as a military Power. She has beat China in war, and is inventing weapons of destruction. After years of experiment, one of her sons has perfected a new rifle and obtained permission to manufacture it. The weapon to said to have five advantages over any rifle now in use in Japan, namely, (1) its reduced weight and easier action; (2) less powder is required than for any other arm of equal power; (3) 175 rounds can be fired in the same time or 75 more than from any other gun; (4) the manufacturing cost is less; (5) while the existing rifle cannot be discharged when even a triffing obstacle gets into the lock, the new one can be fired even in sand, and the barrel will not burst if 80,000 rounds be fired from it.

THE Legal Practitioners' Act is being amended. The Law Member has introduced a Bill for better and speedier suppression of law-touting, It is proposed to empower the High Courts to suspend or dismiss any pleader or mooktear found guilty of unprofessional conduct and authorize the District and Sessions Judges and Commissioners of Divisions to punish, in the same way, revenue agents, pleaders or mooktears who are found or reputed to be habitnal dalals or law touts, the suspension or dismissal by these authorities being subject to an appeal to the High Courts.

The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab strongly supported the measure. He said that professional men generally looked on the liabit of touting as most mischievous. Whatever the stringency of the law, the practice will continue, for it has support in high quarters supposed to be above low practices.

THE Code of Criminal Procedure is also to be tinkered. The object of the Bill introduced for the purpose by Sir Alexander Miller is stated to be " to give effect to certain recommendations made by the Commission appointed to enquire into the trial by Jury system." From a telegram in the Englishman it appears that all the recommendations have not been accepted. Among other things, it is proposed to empower Judges to require from jurars, either Before or after, or both before and after, the teturn of their verdict, separate guidings on issues of fact. Without the Bill and the speech of the Law Member which have not yet reached Calcutta, it is too early to speak on the subject. We only hope the system of trial by jury will not be undermined in view of its abolition at a future date.

THE Government offices will close at Sunla on the 2nd November reopening at Calcutta on the 4th.

YESTERDAY, at the Town Hall, Lard Sandhurst was installed District Pro-Grand Master of Freemasonry in Bombay and its territories The ceremony was completed, as in all British gatherings, by a banquet at which two hundred brethren were present,

The High Court has quashed the conviction in the Budh Gya temple case. Both the Judges hold that no offence was committed under section 296 of the Indian Penal Code, and that the worship of Dharm. pala and his associates was not lawful.

WE had a hero of 132 fights in Calcutta. There is now a slayer of 12 panthers in the Vizagapatain Agency Tracts. The young Maharaja of Jeypore, a pupil of Mr. Marsh, writes to a contemporary Maharuja of Jeypore, a pupil of Mr. Marsh, writes to a contemporary "On Monday, the 22nd ultima, at I.P. M., I received news from Sanokandi, a village 5 miles from Jeypore, that a panther had killed a cow the previous night. I started at 4 o'clock; bui, owing to bad roads, did not arrive before 6 o'clock. I got into the machan that had been prepared for me at 7 o'clock. There was very heavy rain, and the night was very dark. The panther came at 8 o'clock. I heard the noise of the panther to be in, I fired, and luckily strick the beast on the right side. He roared when he was struck, and rain about 30 yard. It was too dark to follow him that night, but next morning the villagers found him dead, and brought his calcass to my fort. It measured? It was too dark to follow him that night, but next morning the villagers found him dead, and brought his careass to my fort. It measured 7 feet 5½ inches. On Tuesday, the 23rd dein, I received khubbar at 3 o'clock that a pantiter had killed a dog in the village of Unne, 3 miles from Jeypure. As on Monday it was running hard and very dark, so I had to judge from the crunching of the painther where he was, I got into the machan at 7 o'clock, and had to wait till 9 o'clock for the pantiter. As on the former occasion I had judged accurately, so I was again fortunate enough to send a bullet into the shoulder, which killed him on the spot. The pantiter measured 6 feet 10½ came home at 10 P.M. Ou Thuisday, the 2th idem, at which killed him on the spot. The painther measured 6 feet 10½ inches. I came home at 10 P.M. On Thursday, the 25th idem, at 3 o'clock khubber of another kill by a panther at Kokahandi, another village near Jeypore, reactied me. I started at 4 o'clock. Here the kill was near a house, so a machan was not necessary. I took my station in the hause, and imp-holed the wall facing the kill. The painther came at 9 o'clock. The night was clear, so I had a good and I field and sent a bullet right through the head. The painther fell at once and never moved. It was 6 feet 5 inches long. I returned home at 10 o'clock. I have now shot 12 painthers."

The Maharaja is still very young and may yet outnumber the fights of the hero. It is to be desired that under Mr. Maish's tuition he will prove more than a good shot in the dark, and smell rate as well as panthers.

For valuable assistance rendered in conciliating the rival religious factions in the town of Yeala, the Governor of Bombay in Council has conferred on Gapairao Shivden, Rajah Bahadui, of Malegani, a Second Class Sardar of the Deccan, the dignity and status of a Sardar of the First Class.

MOUVI A. Q. M. Naorul Alam, of the Calcutta Mediessah, has addressed the following circular to the parents and guardians of the students of that institution :-

the students of that institution:—
"The undersigned begs to tenind the parents and guardians of the students attending the English Department of the Calcuna Madrasah, the Alma Mater of the Mahomedan Education in these Provinces, and now a century old, that the initial absence of reign our training at school of at any other place renders young minds free to adopt the views and habits of others, withing knowing whether those ideas and habits are consonant with the tenets of Islam. Obstacles to the advancement of Religious Education exist. whether those to the advancement of Religious Education exist both at school and at home—at school, because the University dispenses with religious training; at home, because it has prescribed a course of subjects in learning which Indian students can spare but little, if any, time for religious education. After compitating their University career, worldly cares beset them to such as extent that they feel no inclination in this direction. There is thus a great danger of a revolution in the religious sentiments of the rising generation. The adoption of foreign ideas and customs has produced an alarming increase in disobedience and insubindination on the part of the young. The young and inexperienced feel no scruple in doing actions and in eating food that are strictly forbidden by Mahomedan Law. Only recently the insubordination and inveverence of school-going boys roused the Government of accord its serious attention to the public to discuss the subject. From accord its serious attention to the matter, and hence in 1288 as opportunity was given to the public to discuss the subject. From the report on Discipline and Moral Tianing in Schools and Colleges in India, published by the Supreme Government, it is evident that, without religious teaching, the progress of the abovernmentoned growing evil will not be restrained and checked.

Venturing to attempt to remedy this state of things, by impariting religious instruction to the present generation of young metallinough an Ution religious book ensitted Normal Montains, the undersigned has obtained the permission of the Educational Authorities to give religious training to the students of the Madrasah—bible Sunnis and Shias,—after school hours. But before opening a Religious Class, for which the a instance and services of competent men, connected with the Madristh (especially of Stansul Ulama Monly) Alimed, the Heat-Monry of the Arabic Denartment), have been secured, it is necessary for the undersigned to have in this connection, the opinions and suggestions of the prients and guardians of intending papils. Then kind support is therefore carnestly solicited. To meet the expenses of the class a small fee of two or four annas—according to the number of pupils—will be charged."

If for the small fee, the Moulvi can reform the boys, he will have done a service to his community. The attempt is laudable. There is a general complaint that M donneda, like Hindu, boys are growing more and more immannerly and impatient of discipline. They have grown so wise that they call their fathers fools.

In the village of Bankipore, in the Diamond Harbour sub-division of the 24-Perginas, an old man pained Sham Nath Jogi has been killed by his son Sarodaprasad, a boy of sixteen years. On account of his victims life, he was indeted out of the house. The son retaliated by driving the father out of the world. He stinick him with a heavy clinb white smoking the hookah. The blow fractured the head and the old main deed after removal to hospital.

MR. CURZON, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affins, replying to Mr. Carson, said it would be impolitic to raise the question of an indemnity to families of British subjects mindered at Kucheng until the murderers had been punished, which was of primary importance. The Commission to enquire into the missacres has arrived there and several important arrests have been made. Renter's correspondent at Hongkung telegraphs that the Prefect attached to the Commission and the Chinese officials at Kucheng refuse to permit the British and American Consuls to be present at the examination of the prisoners. The Consuls have protested, and the matter has been referred to the Viceroy. 'The Times' correspondent at Hongkong reports that the soldiers are plundering the people, and more incendiary placards have been posted in Conton. The latest news is that an armed mob has wrecked the Chapel and school house of the American Mission near Fouchow. The populace are parading the streets with the cry " Drive out the foreign devils."

Mr. Cuizna, in reply to another question, said that the Government was not informed of the terms of the Franco-Chinese Convention, which is still unranified: but Her Majesty's Government would take the necessary steps to prevent any disregard of Chinese engagements to Great Britain in reference to the territory affected by the Convention.

In his maiden speech in the House of Commons, Mr. H. M. Stanley supported the Uganda railway scheme, saying it would be impossible for the British to evacute Egypt until the Soudan was restored to order, and that it would be necessary to extend the Street, Westminster, London, S. W.

Mr. Curzon, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, replying to several questions, said that, with the fullest reserve, the Government had addressed France regarding her movements on the Nicer. He was renorant of the despatch of any Feach expedition to Equipore. With regard to Egypt he said the time had not yet arrived to reconsider the question of the evacuation of that country by the British, and the Government were not prepared to announce their pincy in connection therewith, He then referred to the Buffer State question in Northern Siam, and said that the Government policy in Kincheng and the country beyond the Mekong would be the same as Lord Rosebery's. With reference to Soun, Mr. Carzon and that the object of Government would be to vin ucase British interests, and safeguard the integrity and autonomy of the Siamese. Government, and see that China granted to Burna the same advantages as those accorded to Tangum.

LORD Lansdowne, Secretary for War, stated in the House of Lords, on Augst 19, that Lord Wolseley would succeed the Duke of Cambridge as Commander-in-Chief on the 1st of November. The conditions of the appointment were being considered, the Government having reserved the liberty to make any necessary changes.

IT has transpired that when he was received at Windsor, the Shahzada communicated to the Queen a request that the Amir should be officially represented in London by a diplomatist, but an inflavantable reply was made. The Pince leaves England next week, and will stay in Paris for a few days. He will embark on the Clive at Marseilles about the 9th of September.

THE Times regards the statement in the by Lind Substitution regard to Armenia as an emphatic wirning to the Suban that, unless reforms are introduced, it will be improbable that the Paiwers will continue to guarantee Taikish autonomy. But the Portes seems resolved and has again rejected the demand of the Powers.

A MEETING of members of the House of Commons who are favourable to currency reform was held, on August 16, under the presidency of Sir William Houldsworth, and a resolution passed forming a committee of the House of Commons to promote an international silver conference.

A CONFERENCE of Lancashire millowners held in London has nominated a Committee to co-operate with the Parliamentary Committee against the cotton import duties in India.

THE Criminal S-suons of the High Court will commence on Monday next, Mr. Justice Sale presiding. The calendar is an extremely light one as regards the number of prisoners, but a heavy one indeed when we consider the character of the crimes charged to Annadaprasad Ghose who will be tried for mirder and attempt at morder of his three sous and two brothers-in-law. After examining over two dozen witnesses, the Hon'ble Syed Ameer Hossein Khan Bahadoor committed the prisoner on Thursday. None of the witnesses was cross-examined, the prisoner reserving his defence for the High Court. Whatever the feeling against him in native society, he may be confident of a just and impartial trial

THE High Court rises for the Long Vacation on the 10th September, With the close of the court, Mr. Justice Sale ceases to be a Judge, for Mr. Justice Trevelyan for whom he has been acting is expected to join after the holidays.

ON a representation from a number of Fellows that none of the members of the Syndicate shauld be appointed Examiners, it recorded a resolution to that effect so far as it was practicable. After following the principle for a time, the loophole has been taken advantage of to further advance the power of the king of the University.

The President of the Faculty of Law nominates the law examiners. For the present year he selected Mr. Allan and Mr. Casperez for the Hononits examination. Two examiners have hitherto been considered sufficient and for the last two years both of them have been Europeans. The king who was admitted to the Honours only the year before last was now anxious to have the upper hand in the examination as in all other matters. A plea was started that European examiners were not Hindu lawyers, and it has been decided to appoint a Bengali. And who more fitted than the freshest from the examination? To meet any possible objection on financial grounds, he is willing to do the work, unlike a lawyer, without any fees. We are not told whether the Syndicate has passed a resolution thanking the Babu for the generous solf-sacrifice in the cause of the University.

WHILE the Freemisons of Bombay were making themselves ready to instal Lord Sandhurst as District Pro-Grand Master, another worthy member of the Craft, was preparing the field for its extension in Bengal. On Wednesday, Mr. Skrine, the Officiating Collector of Customs, read at the Hall of the Society for the Higher Teaming of Young Men, an interesting and entertaining lecture on Freemasonry. The chair was taken by Mr. Longley, an old member of the Brotherhood. He was modest enough not to trace the institution, like many of his brethren, to the father of mankind, but attributed to it many good things of this world. He made a distinction between a Mason and a good member of the Craft. Mr. Skrue was full of his subject. For the short time at his disposal, he could give only a rapid sketch of the use and progress, the eclipse and regeneration of the Frateinity which his overspield Europe. The eloquence of the address was a surprise to many, Mr. Skrine's fame for ability, versatility and sympathy for the Indians had preceded him to Cilcuita. On the present occasion, he surprissed honself and many of his compeets. There were passiges to the address of an elevation of style and thythm which we do not usually find to Angla-Indian literature. The peroration was magnificent.

"In India, he said, prospects were most hopeful. He trusted that he would see the day when every town throughout the Empire would have its little body of idents, banded together in the bonds of brotherly love. These are times, he is used, when all who have the welfare of this great country at heart should fraget animosities and accidental difference of creed and coloni, and match shoulder to shoulder in the ratio and spring through a period of trushion, when that and sympathy alone can reconcide claims, apparently conflicting to social and political equality. Freemasony may be made a powerful factor in unining firsters which, rightly directed, would give beathly civic life to the dense masses of ignorance and prejudice that surround us. That it is destined to thrive and develop throughout the world at large is equally certain. In the age of teeming populations, of a daily in creasing struggle for existence, of the ruthless oppression of the weak by the strung, the Lodge is a baveo of peace for the hewildered unit in this human hive. These, at least, the din of competition without sounds softly; there his eyes rest only on friendly faces: there he is conscious that all are annuated by the maxim—' Every man for his brother and God for all $l^{\rm in}$

Read slowly, the lecture would, perhaps, have been more impressive. Those who could not follow still enjoyed in, for it was an artistic piece of workminiship throughout. We give the two anecdotes related by the lecturer which heightened the interest of the andience. The first is well-known in Masonic circles. The young lady afterwards became Mrs. St. Leger, pronounced "Silinger," and her guardian was out here in India. There is no doubt about its authenticity. The other is a personal experience of the lecturer.

Speaking of the somewhat ungallant rule which excludes the fair sex from Masonic gatherings, Mr. Skiine narrated its history thus —

"About the middle of the last century a young Irish nobleman, who was an enthusiastic Mason and Master of his Ludges had a lovely maiden sister who was endowed with a full share of female inquisitiveness. She burned to know the nature of the secret rites periodically enacted in the family dining room where the Lodge was held. So an hour or two before the time fixed for an assemblage the gul ensconced herself in the case of a tall, old clock of the "graudfather" species, which stood in a corner of the round. In the cramped position she heard evrything that passed at the initiation of a recruit, and would doubtless have escaped with her ill-gotten knowledge had not her brother remarked that the timepiece had stopped, the weights and pendulum having been deranged by the pressure of the delinquent's hody. He opened the case to set the clock going and stood aghast at the discovery. Then, beside himself with fury, he drew his sword and would have taken his sister's life had he not been held back by the breinien. The funting intruder was relegated to the doorkeeper's custody, while her fate was decided. Many were of opinion that death should be the penalty, but bually milder counsels prevailed; and it was resolved that, as the culprit had bearnt so much, there was nothing for it but to complete the process of initiation. And so the young lady became a Mason, and used to walk in the first line in processions of the Craft."

Again, he says .-

" It is possible that Masous themselves are not aware how widely spread is some knowledge, gurbled it may be, of the principles of their science. An incident in my own life occurs to me which appeared likely to open up a variety of curious problems. Many years ago, when Assistant Migistrate in a Fransgangetic district, I received a report from the local police of the arrival of a gang of Nutles, or G ypsies. Wherever these social plagnes had halted there arose a loud and bitter wail from the villagers of missing goats and pillaged gardens. I, therefore, obtained the District Magistrate's permission to prosecute them for bad livelinood. In due comise thece appeared before me in the dock, imprimis, an old min the effect of whose patriarchal beard was married by his shifty eyes, secondly, a pair of handsome impadent girls, and last, an indefinite number of children of ever type, many of whom had been, I fear, stolen from their distracted parents. After a brief enquity I discharged the women folk on their and at king to quit the district within 24 froms, detained some of the little ones for further researches, and ordered the old leader of the going to find security in Rs. 200 to be of good behaviour for a year. I need hardly add that no bail was forthcoming. I was m the act of informing the fellow that he would have to go to fail for a twelvemonth, when, lo, he discovered himself to me as a Mason! I was struck 'all of a heap,' but duty had to be done and my brother in Ccatt' was haited away to docume vite. I pondered long on the curious discovery I had made. How could a common Gypsy have gained a knowledge of mysteries so closely guarded? To sairsfy my corrosity. I paid a visit to the jul and secured a private interview with the old Nuth. Howis very salky and not at all inclined to be communicative, but after a little pressing, he convioced me that he was a Mason; and what is more, that he held a higher grade in the inerarchy than I did. I then mged him to tell me how he had been initiated. He glanced at me with a peculiar twinkle in his beady eyes and said, 'Sahib, if I tell you all, will you let me out?' I was obliged to tell him that his release did not rest with me, but with the District Magistrate, who alone had the power to cancel an order of the kind. 'Then ask the Bara Saheb,' he said, 'sorely he will listen to you and let me go.' I explained that that functionary was not a brother Mison and would not lank at things in the same light as I did. 'Well,' he said, 'I will not tell you anything.' And so I went away discondited : and being shortly afterwards transferred.

to another district, lost a unique apportunity of discovering a wonder-

THE criminal information in the Caref Magistrate's Court against Mr. Abul Hissan, the fifth Judge of the Court of Small Ciuses, for assault and battery was withdrawn. The complainant said that he had no case against the defend oit and apologised for having rushed into Court for little or no cause. The matter then dropped,

WE see we have caused unnecessity pain to the relatives of Bahon Jogender Nath Mookerjee, Vakil, High Court, N.-W.-P., mistaking him for Rajendia Lil Mookerjee sentenced to imprisonment. We had erred in the company of the Pioneer, and take the earliest opportunity to make the correction. Rijendra has been let out on bail.

MR. H. C. Ker, otherwise Babu Hem Chunder Ker, is dead and no mistake. While still in the heyday of his service and glory, the newspapers had made him dead. But he survived that paper death long to the joy of his near and dear ones and friends. He had served Government for forty long years. Commencing as a Daruga he ended as a Sub Registrar. In the interior he was admitted to the Subordinate Executive Service and rose to be one of the two officiating native assistant Secretaries in the Bengal Office. He had the reputation of being an excellent officer, though blundering.

THE Statesmen of the 21st August takes exception to some points in our article in the Pilgitin Ships Bill of the 3rd instant We are afraid, we have not been explicit enough. We do not think that it is a mischievous piece of legislation. We said-it is a measure in the right direction and we do not appose the Bill for the object it has in view. The Government of India itself may not " be acquitted of culpable negligence in amitting to take proper steps to ascertain what was going on, and to place its views before the Conference." But that does not preclude any objection to the Bill when it is open to so many attacks. The remark of our contemporary that the Bill confers benefits on the poor pilgrims who will have to pay more dearly, is of the nature of the argument adopted by a Government official who wanted to acquire a piece of rented land on which Government had built without permission of the Zemordar. The owner was told that he was not entitled to any additional tent on account of the construction, because it had improved his land. We are sure a slight raising of the rates of fines for pilgrim ships vill not be minded. The various restrictions and petty annoyances which can only be overcome by money, stand in the way of easy receptance of the measure. Our contemporary will, we believe, understand us when we say that hard laws are not enforceable, and therefore refeat their own purpose. They are bad legislators who frame laws against the manners and customs of a people, whether religious or other. I've diversion of the little maney of the paor pilgrims to procure their convenience, an only tend to subject them to more privations which ultimately may prove their death to the nunoyance of others. It is the tree to argue that they are not entitled to perform the Haj. We need not repeat that the Bill aims at nothing but good. The problem is difficult—how to meet all objections—to do good without inviting evil. Not has the Government approached the subject in a proper way. The Bill is a confession of weakness, and helplessness. For the principal object in view, the Bill only empowers the Executive Government to legislate on the matter at its covernence and in the manner to be deemed desirable.

THE SANITARY DRAINAGE BILL.

THE MACHINERY FOR COLLECTION.

WHEN the Road Cess Bill was under discussion in Council, the Zemindars had stoutly opposed the scheme of collecting the Cess through them. The argument that the imposition of the Cess involved and England, who fully supported the contention of the Zemindars. The memorial the landholders of Bengal addressed to the Secretary of State was rejected. It was held that all that the Government of 1793 had done was only to fix for ever the public revenue. This, it was affirmed, did not preclude succeeding Governments from imposing such local taxes on the landholders as the circumstances of the country might at any time demand. Nothing could be further from Lord Coruwallis's intentions, while he made the assessment permanent, than to absolve the landholders for ever and aye from their liability as subjects to pay such taxes to the State as the State might on any subsequent occasion deem it expedient to demand from them. It was one thing to declare the land revenue permanent and quite another to affirm the absolute immunity of a particular class of subjects from future taxes of any kind. Terms more distinct than those employed in the Settlement Regulations were required before the privilege claimed by the Bengal landholders could be allowed. Besides the language of the Regulations, the Zemindars stood on their pattahs and their vernacular translates executed under official supervision. Those pattahs, with their counterparts, embodied their contracts with the State. All the duties they were required to do, from supplying rations for value to the troops passing through their estates to the reporting of crimes committed within them and the assistance they were to render to the Police in the execution of warrants or for the arrest of proclaimed offenders and suspicious characters, were laid down in them. Considering that all their profits were derivable from land, and that such profits represented the difference between the total yield and the demand of the State, any tax imposed on them would reduce, their profits as effectually as an actual enhancement of the State demand. No tax, therefore, could be imposed on them as landholders which would have the effect of reducing their profits from land. If they traded or did any business, they would certainly be liable to pay such dues as the State might domaind for general or particular purposes. The whole question was argued on either side with great ability. Unfortunately, the decision was pronounced not by independent judges but by one of the parties to the controversy. From the nature of things, the decision could not but be viewed as an act of power instead of being a judicial pronouncement. The Government treats the question as finally closed, while the landholders always press their contention whenever projects are launched forth for touching their pockets, and will do the same till the end of the chapter.

Finding that there was little probability of winning their case, the representatives of the Zemindars, when the Road Cess Bill was on the legislative anvil, directed their energies to oppose the machinery proposed for collection of the Cess. The Zemin dars were sought to be made responsible for the collection under the penalties attached to failure in respect of the revenue. In other words, upon failure to collect a tax imposed on others as on themselves, they were to be deprived of what belonged to them and which they held under an altogether different tenure. Under all civilized Governments derogations are scarcely to be noticed from the principle a direct infringement of the Permanent Settlement of 1793 was scouted by the executive of individual responsibility. The State levies an imposition on A and B. A discharges his obligation lawyers, however, were found, both in India charge by B of the obligation imposed on B, involves an utter reversal of every enlightened principle of rule. In no other country would such legis-lation be possible. The selfishness involved in the scheme was audacious. It was not proposed to aun the Zemindars with any summary power of realization in cases of recusancy. They were to make good all deficits in the collection. The ordinary good all deficits in the collection. The ordinary Civil Courts were pointed out to them, with their slow procedure, for pursuing all recusants.

No juridical argument could be urged for justifying such legislation. The sovereign authority can impose any obligation it likes on the subject so long as that obligation is one whose discharge would depend on the will of the individual burthened with it. The imposition of legislative obligations on any other principle would be absurd. The law might call on A to pay and enforce its call with a penal sanction. To require A, however, to see that B willingly obeys a call made on B and attach penal sanctions to the requisition, would be converting A from a free subject or citizen into something more than a servant of the State. The status . would be an unnatural one, A State servant might lose his situation for inability to make others comply with the demand he has it in charge to enforce. But no Government ever thinks of realising from him sums he fails to collect. The taxgatherer is, at least, free to resign his situation and, toregoing his wages, save what he has as his own. Not so the Zemindar. The proposal, therefore, to utilize the Zemindar's agency for the collection of dues imposed on others, involved an exercise of power that was entirely unwarranted. No precedent could be urged in favour of the plan, drawn from the example of enlightened legislature, ancient or modern. The fact is, the project implied a degree of legislative recklessness that was simply astounding.

The Zemindars have always been distinguished for loyalty. The object Lord Cornwallis had in fixing the land revenue for ever and making it independent of administrations with their incessant changes of personnel, was not simply to protect the rayyets from wilful exactions by giving a permanent interest to the proprietors, but to create a body of sturdy supporters of British rule in India. Lord Cornwallis had the fullest sanction of the Court of Directors as also of the Ministry of the day. There can be no doubt that he sacrificed a portion of the State dues, but, considering the circumstances under which that sacrifice was made, tew could challenge its wisdom. The landholders of Bengal have not falsified the anticipations indulged in their creation. Their loyalty to British rule has never been questioned. From a company of merchants playing the sovereign under royal charters, British rule his developed into right imperial proportions. It may no longer need a landed aristocracy with interests thoroughly identified with its own. After, however, a hundred years of British rule, at a time of profound peace, the Mutiny burst forth with all its horrors. The whole of Gangetic India was ablaze. They, however, who had any stake in the country in the form of property, were found to range themselves on the side of order. Some of the large landholders gave substantial help to the Government. Smaller landed proprietors chose at least to stand neutral. Very few amongst the landed classes cast in their lot Very few amongst the landed classes cast in their lot with the rebel cause. The policy, therefore, even raths and corrected by Ishan Chandra Bandyapadhya. Calcutt-his own should be held responsible for the dis-lat the very height of British power in the East, to burden the landholders with vexatious obligations for the sake of a small advantage to the State, can never be approved by those who wish for the permanence of British rule.

The Road Cess Act was passed. It was well understood, however, that the obligation thrust upon the Zemindars of collecting the dues of the State from the rayyets was thrust upon them with their consent. The Zemindari representatives in Council at least withdrew their opposition. Their Associations also accepted the scheme, without agitating for its reversal. The Road Cess Act, since then, has undergone some tinkerings. All these have been done for further safeguarding the interests of the State. The position of the Zemindars has not been at all improved. So far as the State is concerned, the collection of the Cess has been considerably facilitated. The Zemindars, however, continue to be sufferers. Many of them, unable to realise the Cess from recusant rayyets, particularly from holders of small rent-free lands, are patiently suffering losses year after year, without being able to recoup them by costly appeals to the Civil Courts.

It is scarcely necessary, after this, to comment on the equity of burthening the Zemindars with the obligation of collecting the Drainage Cess. However advantageous the ready agency of the Zemindar may be to the State, the scheme is utterly indefensible from every point of view. Not even was the shadow of an argument attempted in the Council for justifying it. From the Lieutenant-Governor downwards, all the Honourable Councillors expatiated on only the simplicity of the machinery, with copious thanks to the official who had first suggested its adoption.

PANDIT VIDYASAGARA.

This book is a brother's tribute to departed worth. The story of Pandit Vidyasagrr's life has been told from begin ning to end with all its details. The narrators are his younger brothers, for though written by the third brother, Pandit Sambhu Chandra Vidyaratna, the next, Ishan Chandra Banerjee, has revised the narrative carefully. The style is simple and pure with many unlaboured graces. No part of the narrative seems to flag or halt. The eloquence of the writer flows on smoothly, without any symptom of that disease of the understand ing called Furor Biographicus from which a loving and obedient brother could hardly be expected to be free while speaking of a brother whose eminence was unquestioned and whose virtues were universally allowed

The book reminds one of the observations of Macaulay on Boswell. Macaulay, in speaking of "Bozzy," has made a distinction between the author and his work. While praising the work, the critic has depreciated the author by attributing to him. on the best evidence possible, viz., his own admissions, every kind of vice that can stain a gentleman. The general inferiority of Boswell's intellect also has been the critic's theme. He has endeavoured to prove it by various references to the work-The absence of a single remark, of any originality, among the numerous observations of Boswell on men and things, seems to lend colour to the critic's contention. After all, however, Macaulay's estimate of Boswell is, to a great extent, absurd-It is impossible to believe that Boswell, who is universally regarded as the prince of literary biographers, had no art; that, in fact, he blundered into success and produced one of the best books in the English language in the department of biography, with the aid of only a strong memory and careful observation of what passed around him. Whatever the soundness of Macaulay's theory, there can be no donbt, however, that the critic's observations about the simplicity and candour of Boswell are singularly correct. "Those weaknesses which most men keep covered up in the most secret places of the mind, not to be disclosed to the eye of friendship or of love, were precisely the weaknesses which Boswell paraded before all the world. He was perfectly frank, because the weakness of his understanding and the tumult of his spirits prevented him from knowing when he made himself ridiculous. His book resembles nothing so much as the conversation of the inmates of the Palace of Truth."

. Without any of the vices imputed to Boswell, of either character or the understanding, Pandit Vidyaratna has displayed in his book a simplicity and candour that is eminently Boswellian. Many parts of Vidyaratna's narrative read like the conversation of the inmates of the Palace of Truth. Nothing has been attempted to be hidden from the reader. The heartrending poverty of the family when Vidyasagar was born, the hard labour which his father had to undergo for making the two ends meet, the various toilsome domestic offices which the ladies of the house had to discharge but which in even middle class families are entrusted to menials of both sexes, the refusal of a Brahman in tolerable circumstances to marry his daughter to Vidyasagar's father, Thakurdas, on account of the latter's poverty, the acts of naughtiness in which Vidyasagar indulged from exuberance of boyish spirits, the exultation of the family when intelligence was received of Thakurdas's having obtained an employment, with free quarters and board. at Calcutta, on a monthly pay of Rs. 2, which in those days of cheap living, when rice sold for 2 maunds a rupee, would be regarded with as much complacency as an appointment now of Rs. 15 per month, the labour that young Iswar Chandra cheerfully took upon himself, when he came to Calcutta for prosecuting his studies in the Sanskrit College, of cooking the daily food of his father, himself, and his brothers, his utter indifference to what are called the comforts of life, the spirit of endurance he showed amid privations the like of which it has been the lot of few to endure that belong to families of respectable blood, and hundreds of other circumstances, of a similar kind, have all been detailed with an artlessness that is almost amazing and that enhances the reader's esteem for the narrator, considering that the latter, as a brother of the whole blood, is as much exposed as his subject to the gibes of thoughtless vanity in thus drawing aside the veil. Many transactions, again, in which others were actors, have been described with a simplicity that is utterly inconsistent with that conventional respect for eminence which characterises even the least worldly of men and that reserve which bespeaks ordinary prudence. Vidyasagar's biography, is, in some respects, a curiosity in literature. It is a round, unvarnished account of the man and his surroundings as his biographer knew them.

Vidyasagar's ancestors were, many of them, men of learning. His grandfather was a remarkable character. He had abandoned home and friends for becoming a religious wanderer. A dream forced him back to his native village. He had dabbled in astrology. When Vidyasagar was born, he predicted that the child, in all his life, would display a bull-like doggedness of resolution in every thing to which he would set his hand. Irresolution would never be one of his weaknesses. Believers in astrology would find a confirmation of their faith in Vidyasagar's life-story, for the prediction of the grand-father was abundantly verified in all the acts of the grandson. Vidyasagar received the rudiments of his education in the Pathasala of his native village. There he picked up his knowledge of Bengali and such proficiency with figures as might qualify him for a merchant's accountant or a Zemindar's gomasta. The extraordinary intelligence of the boy and the father's connection with a small trading firm at Calcutta where he was an accountant, led to the boy's removal to the metropolis. In those days there were many scholarships in the Sanskrit College and Brahman boys were admitted either free or on nominal fees. Within six months of joining the College, Iswar Chandra got a scholarship of Rs. 5 per month. His scholarships enabled him not only to meet the costs of his own education but afford some help to his father. At College Iswar Chaudra distinguished himself by his intelligence and thorough devotion to his studies. His was a brilliant record of success in every examination. Having joined the College on the 1st of June 1820 he left it in 1841, after a study there of 12 years and 5 months. His final certificate, under the signature of Babu Rasamaya Dutt, the then Secretary, bears date the 10th December 1841, and the subjects in which he had acquired proficiency were Grammar, Poetry, Rhetoric, Vedanta, Nyaya, Astronomy, and the Dharma Sastras, r.e., Hindu law, both ceremonial and relating to inheritance.

We must refer the reader for the details of Vidyasagar's life to the book itself. We have no mind to injure the author by sum marising the story. Nor can any summary, however carefully made, afford the degree of pleasure that one is sure to derive from a perusal of Vidyaratna's pages. A review, again, of such compass as ours, is scarcely the place where Pandit Vidyasagar's services to the cause of Bengali literature, or of the remarriage of Hindu widows, or of the abolition of polygamy, can be discussed in detail. We can but briefly advert to them.

Those who think that there was no Bengali prose before the time of Rammohun Roy are certainly in error. No book might have existed, although that is very doubtful, written in Bangali prose, but then the people conducted their epistolary correspondence in Bengali prose. All legal documents, again, of transfers of property, by gift or sale, were in Bengali prose. The people talked prose, and there is no rease, to suppose that our ancestors, two generations back, talked a language different from ours. From very old times, the curriculum of the village Pathasalas of Bengal embraced Bengali composition as required for purposes of epistolary correspondence, legal documents, and orders by Zemindars to their village agents or gomashtas. Rammohun Roy, therefore, did not invent Bengali prose. His celebrated essay in which he laid down the rules which should be observed in construing Bengali prose, was necessary for the kind of prose he wrote. It was compounded of Bengali and Sanskrit, with the Sanskrit idiom predominating. If he had written as he used to speak or as others spoke, there would have been no necessity for the rules of construction he framed for comprehension of his writings. With Rammohun Roy, therefore, what began was really that sort of prose which we have discarded or are endeavouring to discard. The religious movement which was headed by Rammohun Roy collected a band of scholars around him who did much for creating the sort of Sanskritised Bengali prose, which, it was thought, was the only language consistent with the dignity of writing. The opposition which the Brahmo movement provoked employed writing for the dissemination of its views and, therefore, Bengeli prose was as much indebted to it as to Rammohun Roy and his immediate followers. The early writers of the Tatwabodbon Patrika, the Pashanda Pidana, and the Pattyapradana, did much for Bengali prose. They were the real teachers of Vidyasagar whose early style was not the Bengali of Bankim but a Sanskritise-I Bengali more polished than that of the Rammohun Roy period. Vidyasagar was the father of that Bengali which lives in the pages of his Vetala panchamvingsati, and Sitar-banabasa, and Sakuntalab. Its genus was the same as that of the Bengali of the period immediately before him. Vidyasagar lived to discard that Bengali for the prose of his polygamy paraphlets which is all that one can desire from a purist's point of view. That prose is graver than the prose which is spoken by a man of culture, but its nature is not essentially different. Vidyasagar lived to forget his own earlier Bengali and write the Bengali of at least Vidyabhusan in his Somaprakasa.

The movement about the re-marriage of Hindu widows has been a failure. Vidyasagar lived to see that failure. We can never forget the shock he gave to society in Bengal by his first book in support of the legality of re-marriage. He was answered by a host of Pandits, but there can be no doubt that he had the best of the argument on his side. The whole question. however, we think, was argued on wrong principles. It mattered little which among the host of Hindu sages whose works have come down to us had raised his voice for the re-marriage of Hindu widows. Such re-marriage had fallen into disuse for several centuries. The later Pandits of Bengal who, so far as Hindu law, both ceremonial and that relating to inheritance, is concerned, are as much revered as Parasara or Narada, do not admit the legility of such murriages. Indeed, such marriages had ceased for centuries before their time. The task, therefore, that Vidvasagar proposed to himself, ws., to prove the legality of such marriages from the ancient Dharma Shastras, could be productive of no practical results. It was at best a feat of intellectual gymnastics. The theory that the Rishis never contradict one another, and that their declarations bind the modern Hindus in all concerns of life, is only a fiction. As might have been expected, notwithstanding the large sums of money spent on it, the movement has proved a downright failure. Very few marriages have taken place. Hindu society has not recognised them, Indeed, it has excasted them that have followed Vidvasagar.

The Pandu's attack on Polygamy was, we believe, ntterly uncalled for. With the spread of English education and the difficulty of earning a livelihood, polygamy had been nearly dead when Vidyasagar armed himself against it. That was a downright waste of energy. Not one polygamous marriage has been prevented for Vidyasagar's action on the occasion. Then, again, unter the numerous limitations the Rishis have allowed, their declaration against polygamy, supposing Vidyasagar's interpretation to have been correct, could not be productive of any practical results. The Hindu Shastras allow a man to take a second wife if the first wife utters a single word that is disagreeable to the husband. Matrimonial quarrels, we suppose, are as old as the date of expulsion from Eden when Eve blamed Alam for having be en weak enough to listen to he arguments or solicitations. If the Hindu Dharma Shastras are followed, the least difficulty will not be encountered by a man of marrying propensities in taking as many wives as he likes. The widest door is opened to polygamy by the verse beginning with Sadyanto ipriyavidim. Some of the other limitations, agdin, are as illiculous and absurd. A wife that brings forth only daughters may be superseded. A wife that is ill, continuously for some time, may similarly be discarded. If the Shastric declaration against polygimy wis to be revived, it could not be revived with ut those limitations. Seriously speaking, such revival. were it possible, would only have injured Hindu society without doing it any go d This view was entoiced by Bunkim Chandra Chatterjee in his celebrated article in Bangadarsana in reply to the paygime pumpilet No. II of Pandit Vidyasagar, In closeness of reasoning and pol ished banier, Chatteriee's reply came up to the standard of any of those inimitable productions with which Sydney Smith graced the Edinburgh Review in its proud at days.

Chandi Charan Banerjee has given the world a new life of Vidyasagar. The narrative portions are mainly based on Pandit Vidyaratna's book. Several materi al errors, again, disfigure the new volume. Many of these have been corrected by Vidyaratna in a second publication called Bhrama-nirasha which forms, as it were, the supplement of his first book. Considering the savisfactory character of Vilyaritua's book, there was scarcely any need of Chanli Ciaran's publication, especially when he had very little to ald to the purely narrative portion of his subject's life. Chandi Charan was never familiar with Vidyasagar. His big volume con ains many elaborate d iscussions of topics that are only collaterally connected with his subject's biography, Without treading so closely on Vidyaratna's heels, he might have emplayed himself usefully by throwing these discussions together, reterring his readers for personal particulars to the earlier and more authoritative work.

TRIUMPH OF VASUDEVA.

A Review of Pandit Ram Nath Tarkaratna's" "Våsudeva Vijayam" in the Revue Critique, 13th May 1895. By M. A. Batth.
Translated especially for Rev. and Rayret.

The correct way to present to the reader the poem of Pandir Rannath Taikaratna will be to give an analysis of it.

I. Vásudeva-Krishna reigns over the Yadavas (1-19) at Dvaravati (20-58), surrounded by his queens, among whom shines Rukmini and the new favourite, Satyabhama (59-62). To see the latter, Narada descends from heaven (63-68). He is received by Krishna and Rukmin (60-87)

II. Praise of Krishna by Narada, who presents to Krishna a Parijat flower, from the won-lerful tree in the garden of Indra, who keeps it with jealous care, when, justly, the tree ought to belong to Krishna (1-35). Krishna accepts the flower and makes it over to Rukmini, but he declines to reclaim the tree (36-42). Narada, annoyed, goes away, but before going to Siva, he proceeds to find Kalavati, the nurse of Satyabhama (43-47). Kalavati, faithful to the instructions received by her, gives a false account of the incident to Satyabhama: it was to her that the flower had been intended to be given by Narada but that Krishna had forcibly taken it away in order to present it to Rukmini (48-72).

order to present it to Rukmini (48-73).

III. Lamentations of Satyabhama; she wishes to die (120); Kalavati tries to console her, and promises that she shall have her revenge (21-41). Despondency of Satyabhama, which her companious endeavour in vain to releive (42 68).

IV. On being informed of all this, Krishna goes to her. IV. On being informed of all this, Krishna goes to her. The pertuna: of the Parijat flower, with which he has been impregnated, revives her (1-30). Krishna tenderly questions her as to the cause of her distress. Satyahhama conceals it, but one of her friends reveals it (31-35). Krishna promises to bring the Parijat flower to her (56-63). Night descends upon the reconciled pair (64-73).

Krishna consults them how to obtain the Parijat (26-34). Gada, his younger brother, does not see any other way but one, war, which will be mere play (35-36).

The first edition, the date of which I do not know, contained only 16 cantos, Krishna charges him to carry his message to Indra; at first to ask amicably for the Parijat; in case of refusal, to reply by a declaration of war. (10-47). X. Sun-rise on Kallasa (1-15). Awakening of Devi; Kumara comes to salute his mother (16-24.) and of the near approach of Krishna. She had caused Likhsim, the godders of Fortune to come to her from Indra's heaven, by a message sent through her fullower Vijavá. Lakshimi told Devi of the persecutions she had suffered at the hands of Indra for her attachment to Vishnu. Devi herself has a wish to revenge herself for the previous contemptuous treatment of her by India, as India for the previous contemptuous treatment of het by India, as India had refused the Parijat to her likewise, and she would like to see him himiliated. With this object she sends to him her son Kumara (25-55). Kumara disguised under the form of Vishakha and giving himself out as a nessenger of Krishna, demands the Parijat in ariogant words,—which makes a stuggle mevitable (56 80). On the advice of Brita-patt he consecretes lavanta as the Generalissimo of the Devas (47 62). Sachi, the consort India, sees the ceremony and the spectacle from the top of her palace; her companions, the goddesses, inform her of what is going on, and are alarmed at sinister presages (63-77). Sachi tranquillizes them. Is not India invincible? She goes down, embraces her son, encourages him and Indra, and declares her intenintention. She obeys, and proceeds, beyond the region of the stars, to Brahman (76-116).

Description and match of the army of the Devas towards Mern.

Night comes on (117-148).

XIII. Informed by Garuda of the approach of the cuemy, Krishna gives the alarm to the army of the Yadavas (1-12.) Indra harangaes the Devas: he has done all in his power to prevent a conflict; today also he had declared to Garn la that he was quite willing to give up the Parijat, but that Kiishna must consent to ask it from him with the humility which becomes a younger brother. At present there is no alternative but to fight for the good cause. He despatches Vayu, the god of Wurd, as his scout

XIV. The battle commences (1-24). The exploits of Agni, of Yama, of Varuna, of Vavu, of Knbera, of Jayanta, of Bilarama, of Arjuna, of Gada, of Satyaki, of Pradvunna (25-40). Jayanta triumphs over Pradyumna, but the army of the Devas begins to give way (41-67).

XV. Indra hastens to help. Krishna and Balarama rush to meet him (1 24). Indra flings back Balarama; but powerless against Krishna, he prepares to hurl his vajra, thunder; Krishna, on his part, gets ready to infloose his disc, the Chakra, when Brahman intervenes (25-52) Brahman's hymn to Krishna-Vishnu, the Supreme Being: May Krishna pardon! and Krishna pardons and lowers the Chakra (53-63).

Atter renewed exchange of compliments and peaceful XVI. words, Brahman disappears. Krishna offers unconditional peace (1-16). Brihaspati accepts it in the uame of Indra, and invites Krishna and the Yadavas to Amaravati to ratify it. Krishna Krishna and the Yadavas to Amaravati to ratify it. Krishna accepts the invitation (17-33). Javanta remains implacable. But Indra who had remained silent, feels his pride gradually going down. At last he gives himself up to the joy of reconciliation; he re-animates the dead, and after having ordered Visvakarman, the architect of the gods to make in his capital every preparation for the reception, he mounts his chariot and proceeds there himself, with Krishna, Satvabhama, and the armies of the Devas and Yadavas (34 41). Reception at Amaravati (42-73). at Amaravati (42.73).

XVII. The next day, Krishna and Satyabhama, Indra and Sachi, the Yadavas and Devas, with Visvakarmin as their guide, go out to admire the grand exhibition (Pradateant) of all the wonders of art and industry which Indra had, by his architect, wonders of art and industry which that had, by his architect, organised in honour of his guests (1-108).

XVIII. After having enjoyed for many days the splendid hospitality of the king of heaven, the Yadavas take their leave. Each of the gods gives them the most precious article he has Indra himself gives the Parijata, about which nothing had been mentioned by him since the reconciliation. Krishna and Satyabhama mount the celestial chariot of Indra, which was driven by Matali (1-27). Return from the skies to Dyarayan, Krishna points out to Sayabhama the different regions of the Earth over which they pass in their aerial journey (28 100). Trimmplial reception, and the planting of the Parijat in Dvalavati (101-113). Signature of the poet. (114 118).

The above analysis is only a summary. I beheve, however, that it faithfully reproduces not only the frame-work of the poem, but also all the springs and essential motives of action, so that it will be easy for the reader, should be wish to refer to other works where the same episode is treatedt, to determine whether the subject in its entirety has lost or gained under the hand of Pandit Rimnath Tarkaratna. But I ought, under the hand of Pandit Rimnath Tarkaratna. But I ought, at the same time, to add that such comparison will hardly he equitable. The entire design, the plan, even the subject, are of the least importance here. By themselves they are of small import; they are simple themes, they are opportunities more or less favourable. The value lies in the elaboration of more or tess rayourante. I me value ties in the elaboration of the details. And this the Pandit has done with extreme care and brillancy. He has shown real qualities of observation and inventive faculty in the additions made, of an intelligence which is at once supple and keen, skillul in allusions and in eatching the subtle harmony of things; of an imagination frequently the sibile harmony of things; of an imagination required accurate and always ingenious to cause a metaphor to flash out, to dress and colour the comparisons, to be lavish as regards the alunkara, those ornaments which, according to Hindu doctrine, are the very soul of paesy. He likewise knows well to clothe the whole with the rich and flowery diction of the Mahakavya, the resources for which he possess in a high degree, Mahkayya, the resources for which he posseces in a night degree, and to put into masterly metrical forms! Indian criticism, therefore, has given the most flattering reception to his "Triumph of Vásudeva." It has not considered the work unworthy of being placed side by side with the best works of the classical period; he has even been, in this connection, styled Kilidava. This was probably the name or the surname of the father of the Pandit. He has himself placed his work under the auspices of a statica of the "Malayikagimura," and the return from the skies to Dvaravati, in the 18th canto, is an amplificafrom the skies to Dvaravati, in the 18th canto, is an amplifica-tion of a well-known scene in Sakuntalas. I doubt, however, of his having specially received his inspiration from Kalidasa. Anyhow, he would have remained far behind his model in relative subriety and in delicacy of taste. His diction, strain ed to exaggeration, surcharged and with long compounds, is full of assonance, allicrations, and play upon words, which, in spite of his eleverness, are made at the expense of the language, which, though remaining materially correct, loses its idiomatic vigouil. If there has been any initation of the works

The author informs us that he was born in Santipin (district Nadia, Bengal) of a respectable Bishinian family, gotra Bharadwaya. His father, Kalislasa Kavi, (or in the name nothing but a metaphor?) --a poet like himself, was equally versed in the Smritt, in the doctrine of the Tinitas, in the Nyaya, in the Minnist and in the Saukhya, and had merited the surname of Vidyabagica. He himself had likewise composed not poem in the year 18-5 Saka, 1882 A. D., and in it pays his homage to a patron of a master by the name of Sib Chandia. -- a poet like himself, was equally versed in the Smritt, in the

- The author seems to think that every expression, (derivative, and, above all, compound) which is grammatically allowable, is, for this reason, justifiable. Has he good authority for using only Nandana in the sense of "son" (XII. 53), or for Sabitya, Sabica (II. 44)? Giri and adre are synonyms of Parata; are they still (II. 44)? Gir and adri are synonyms of rawlat, at the synonymes when Parvata is a proper name (VII. 39, 53, 64)? of Kalidasa, it has been chiefly of the Nalidaya. But he has done it with incontestible dilectantism. India, however, easily pardons this. She has for a long time been in the habit of confounding together the pleasure of perusal of the works of the poets and of guessing enigmas!

Per contra, to the European reader these are grave defects. Whatever he may do, how willingly soever he may endeavour to place hunself in a Hindu point of view, he will be sure to feel painfully the artificial and unpleasantly impersonal nature of poetry. He may perhaps, think that all modern Mahakayyas must, of necessity be immaring and that a large number of old models. of necessity, be imitation, and that a large number of old models are the same. These latter, however, he will agree to read, because they are ancient documents, but he will with difficulty resign himself to knock his head against imitations where this quality is wanting. These tatal conditions do not depend so much on the law of style, which is not so terse as to lose its elasticity, nor so aw or style, which is not so lerse as to love its classicity, not so vigorous as the preceding, which a daring spirit can pass over, as on the language itself, which ties down thoughts to used forms and imposes a common bond. Nowhere is the workman subjected by the instrument with which he works to such a bondage, for the instrument here is a dead language, which, in the state in which it has to be used, has never been The unlimited richness of its vocabulary and a living one. the poverty of its syntax reduce poetical work to the construction of epithets; the propositions, in their turn, juxtapose them-selves without being subject to each other; in lieu of periods we have stanzas independent one of another. The result is a kind of patch-work, in which everything is on the same plan and of the same value,—a discourse not woven logether and without any perspective. No doubt, the language is excellent when sentences have to be brought out, and when images and comparisons have to be fashioned, and, in this respect, there are in the poem of Pandit Tarkaraina a whole respect, there are in the poem of Pandit Tarkaratna a whole assortment of delicately-worked gems. It also lends itself admirably to descriptions so long as the object is simple or when the synthesis can be made easily; the picture, for instance, of the approach of night, at the end of the 4th caura, is very beautiful. But it fails whenever the object is complex (thus the description of the Himalaya is a complete failure, and it could not but be sq), and it becomes wholly powerless in a narration. The equivocal character of Narada cannot be grasped unless one has come across him elsewhere,—we cannot gather it from The equivocal character of Narada cannot be grasped unless one has come across him elsewhere,—we cannot gather it from the text; and it is not less difficult to find in the 10th canto the motives of action of Devi and Kumara. Anyhow, the solution of this enigmatical narrative appears to be placed, and, as it were smothered in the folds of some long epither, where there is every chance of not discovering it in the midst of this confusion which

The Pandits who, from time immemorial, are addicted to the use of high rhotoric are not more dillettantes. They always have, as a professional occupation (one or more of the Shasttas) certain rules of which the Sanskit language is the organ. As, of old, amongst us, all literary men, whatever might be their specialities, deemed it an honour to make their essay in Latin verses, so it isthat to confirm their reputation for learning, they (the Pandits) compose poems which are, in reality, as much works of science as of imagination. The Pandit Parkaratna is no exception to this rule. Santipur, his native village, is one of the centres of Vishnuism and Brahmanical culture in Bengal, and we have seen above that the study of many Shastras was hereditary in his family. He himself is now editing, in the Bublotheca Indica, the Sri Bhashya---the commentary of Ramanuja of the Vedanta Sutras, -- and he is two original works on these very Satras. As a jurist, versed in the Smriti, he took a prominent part in the conproversy occasioned by the Age of Consent Bill, the recent. Act. by which the Anglo-Indian Government tried to remedy the most crying evil of early marriage; and by his intervention in favour of the Bill exposed himself to the malice of orthodox fanaticism. Lastly, for many years, he did the major portion of the work of numbering and classifying the Sanskrit manuscripts of Bengal, conducted by the and charactering in Sanskit manuscripts of bengal, conducted by the late Rajendralala Mitra, and it is, in a great measure, owing to his long and labortous researches that the volumes of the Novice, published under the the auspices of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta have become the most useful, one may say the only useful work of its kind executed in India by natives of the country. It is not necessary for me to dwell here on the disgrace which he has since suffered at the hands of this very Society, nor the controversies which this disgrace has given rise to. My sole object in describing this multifarious activity as been to show that the Pandit has not departed from the traditions of his fathers. "He has not blackened before them the face of Saraswati,", and he has remained faithful also to this tradition in composing his "Triumph of Vasudeva." In this last act of fidelity he has a double merit. In tormer times the profession of the poet not only brought him honour but gold of Kalidasa, it has been chiefly of the Nahidaya. But he has also. The Rijas had open hands to pay for a dedication. Nowa-days, those that have retained a shadow of power, have their Budget supervised by a British Resident; those that have sunk into private life, employ, no doubt, their funds in a more useful way, although it may be only as shareholders. There is no dedication at the commencement of the "Triumph of Vásudeava." The profession does not any longer pay, notwithstanding the renewed favour now being entoyed by Sanskett studies in India. These studies are now pursued on other lines, and it is easy to foresee that authors of Mahakavasa will be rare in the future. All the more reason why they should make haste, who are entious to see how literary forms survive, and how some new elements may permeate the most petrified of these forms.

STARVED INTO MUTINY.

A FAMOUS onliney on shipboard came to pass in this way : When the A FAMOUS omining on shipboard came to pass in this way: When the simp, which had sailed from London, was well down the Channel, it was found that the provisions intended for the use of the ciew were rotten and, of course, unestable. The men complained to the captain, who promised to put into into some usar port and exchange the bad stones for good. He fund to keep his word, and as the poor sailors couldn't sail the ship 10,000 miles on empty stomachs, they killed the couldn't sail the slip 10,000 miles on empty stomachs, they killed the captan and mate, helped themselves to the cabin provisions, held high pinks for a few weeks, and finally scittled the slip, put off in the boars, and were all lost but three. The captain could have prevented all this if he had chosen to ; but perbaps the owners and he had put up the bad joh on the men. Very likely, and got served out for it. They were both cuminals and fools.

But there are ships that must needs sail to the end of the voyage with only the original stores. Come what may, they could go back or put into any port. Some are well found and others badly; and so voyages differ.

To madify the allustration, the latter kind of vessels are home.

To modify the illustration, the latter kind of vessels are human beings. At burth we sail on a voyage, which by rights englit to be seventy years long. But how many of us continue on the Sea of Life beings. At birth, we sait on a voyage, severity years long. But how many of us continue on the Sea of Life trust long? Very few compountively Most of us go down sooner. Why? Because we reckiessly, carelessly, or ignorantly waste the stock of vital force with which Nature endows us at the stait. There are no meat snops or bakeries on the Atlantic, not are there amy places after birth, where we can beg on buy more "life." This is perfectly obtain to me. Is it plain to you? I am afraid it isn't. Let's see after brith where we can beg or bny more "tife." This is perfectly plans to me. Is it plans to you? I am afraid it isn't. Let's see whether a little meddent will throw light ou it.

Mr. Heray Fish had been a fortunate man. His forbears had done well by min. Up to the Autumn of 1890 he could say, "I have always been strong and healthy." For thirty years he had worked as a painter for one couployer. He miss have been not only a healthy man, but a good pinter. So far his "vitality," his constitution, had been equal to air demands on it. It had endured a lot of haid work, resisted the weather, and digested his food. Then it refused to go on. It struck work. It wouldn't make sail or pull an oar. In plain English the symptoms of signs of the trouble were these: Loss of appetite, had taste in the mouth, terrible pains after eating, yellow eyes and skin, and the matter goot in the feet. His legs and stomach became featurily swotlen, and his heart palpitated and thumped frightfithy nearly aft the time. On account of the distress given him by solid food he could only eat slops, and not much strength can be got out of them.

By-and-by the best the could do was to hobble about on crutches.

He could not be abed at ail, because he couldn't draw his breath when the cound not he abed at all, because he couldn't draw his meant when ying down. For over a month he snatched what siesp he could when supported upright on his critches. Just think of that, and be thankful it wasn't yout cose. He wasn't able to lift his hand to his mouth, and had to be nursed night and day. He got so low (in spite of doctors attending him) that he dotn't expect to live, and don't desire to. One attending finn) that he didn't expect to live, and didn't desire to. One doctor said he had nearl disease, and that his heart was ling as a boundar's which was nonsense. Doing all this illness Mr. Fish had a professional nuise from a convalencent home. When he had sank so towas to in older it a wonder how he kept affive at all, he first heard of the meatine worth findly cured him. In concluding his letter he says, "After beginning to take Mother Segel's Curative Symp I never looked behind mr. I got stronger every day, and have ailed nothing since. This medicine is vivel my life, and I want the public to know it. (Signed) Henry Fish, Great Malvern, County of Worcester, January 12th, 1893."

12th, 1803."
Only a word more. We sunke of men and women being like ships that have to sail to the end of the voyage with what supplies they start with. By that we in an, not supplies of food, but supply of power to digest food. You see the difference? Bread and meat are no better than lead, and leather if you can't digest them. In Mr. Fish's case it was not food that faled, but power to use it. He had indigestion and dyspepsia. The wonderful remedy discovered by Mother Seight stopped the waste of vitinity caused by the disease, and enabled Nature to use food to build up the perisoning body. He will now proceed, we hope, rowards the part of Old Age, with favouring winds. Yet, save for timely rescue, he would doubtless have gone down, as millions do, leiving but a momentary eddy over the spot where they disappear.

There are specimens of this kind,—a very small mumber in Vasudeva Vijayam; but the permeation is in so strong a dose, that it looks incongruous; for example, the sort of hymn to liberty, to independence, and to union, which Indra recites in canto XIII, and the universal exhibition in Amaravati. Here is seen new wine out into old bottles. One can, for once in a way, conceive of a Mahakavya having for its theme the Electric Telegraph; it will not be more modern for that.

The comething, in the dearth of blice, In dream, at least, of what hath been; That lovely resting place, between Our infant wee, and the abyes Of those, that want our tiper years; I'd hey deny the thies of fears; When first the mutual pledge is given, And heart to heart, and eye to eye, Respond in sweetest sympathy, Of lave on earth;—of lave in heaven.

It is a rejugous coremony performed, for the final test of the decembed. When the Shinadh happens to be that of a wealthy person, theraf presents are made to the Brahimus, and considerable soms of money distributed mong the poor: on some occasions of the sort, the crowd is so great, that serious accidents occur to the puor creatures, thus collected

† The Hundous wind appear to believe, in an intermediate state, somewhar recembing the purgatory of the Roman Catholics; and the pliguinage to Gyah is performed, principally with the view of obtaining rest for the souls of their departed progenitors, and the blending or minor of their spirits, with those of their ancestors, already blest. The ceremony, I believe, is supposed to be performed with most effect, by a son of the deceased, and the Hundous are all accordingly desirons of male offspring; but in cases, in which that blessing has been denied, a son may be adopted for the purpose, inheriting, at the same time, the wealth of the deceased, or the ceremonies may, I believe, be performed, by a grandson, or other near male relative.

Behold I the plan extend, an open waste, The knolls rough-scattered, as no nature's haste, More near,-the city shunbering on its height, Warm in the rays of day's expiring light; The spires with foliage blent of nichest dyes, The white walls glist'ning, o'er the housetops, rise, And higher yet, Rimgy th's lanely hill,

The following account of the contrading ceremonies performed on the last and principal day, at the Att hability is taken from a small work of fiction, but is sufficiently accounte for the general reader.

"Meanwhile, the accustomed ceremonies of the pilgrininge proceeded slowly, but regularly. The Rijah had made his offerings to the gods, and had offered up prayers, for the repose of the Manes of his accessors, at the several shanes, and these were not a fews for there is a very stript readition. Crowned with its gorgeous tree, more lonely still,* The farry scene dertupping with its boughs, Like diadem, on beauty's matchless brows ; While vengeful Doorgab, throned on either hand, From mountain shrines, beholds her fav'rite land,t Her hundred pennons flung abroad, and given, In every hue, to won the breath of heaven : I Behind-Mybeer's far distant hills are roll'd, Their summits glowing, in their tints of gold ; Approach more near-the Fulga sweeps along His world of waters, beautiful as strong, Lo ! where he cames, on the horizon's verge, The half-hid groves scarce, o'er his wave, emerge ; § His sloping banks with fruitful promise bend, And distant crags their wilder grandeur lend.

Such is my own, my native vale, And Oh ! believe, I loved it well. But never more, shall foot of mine Leave impress, on its sacred soil, Or stand unshed, before the shrine, Of that famed Princess' costly pile ! Where Vishmon, as our Ved'he attest, I Stamps on the grant-demon's breast : Such thought, thou see'st, is idle now, For death is marked, upon my brow; But were his threats and terrors vain, I date not ventme there again; I need it not .- each nook and glen Is as familiar to my ken; Thu' ten long years have passed away, As I had left them yesterday; And once, right dear they were to me, And dear to me they would be still, But for that fital memory. That uses oft, against my will, And will not, with my wish, depart It hath such mastery o'er my heart. Yes I I have eaten of thy salt, Kind stranger! and I will unfold To thee my tale : tho' every fanit, And crime must there be shown, and told.

* Ramgyah is a small detached hill, surmainted by a gorgeous wide spreading tree. It is surfaced, on the right back of the Fulgo, immediately opposite the ald town of Gynh, and has altogether a very picture-que appenrance.

- + The temples, on the tops of the Ramsulah, and Bhurinjonin, on each side of the town, are those here alluded to.
- The Bishmins are in the habit of hoisting peanous, or small flags of different colors, in the spires of some of the Hindon temples in India; at Gyah this is particularly the case. These peanons seen from a distance, principally, if the temple be in an elevated smanion, or be in other respects romantically situated, add much to the picturesque effect.
- § The appearance, here endeavoured to be described, is very remarkable in the stegat or great Groges, where, in looking from one side of the river to the other, the manga topes or growes seem half submerged in the river; for the same reason probably, that the full of a vessel is not 'visible at sea, while at any considerable distance
- If The tenrole of the Bishin Pud'h, (or Vishnoo's foot,) built at an expense, I think, I was told by the Brahinins, of nine likhis of copees, by that celebrated Mharatta Princess of the house of Holkar, copers, by the celebrated Maritta Princess of the house of Holkar, Ahithah Buree, of whom, so interesting an account has been published by Sir John Malculin, in his memoir on Central India. The structure, which is handsome for a Hindon Temple, is composed entirely of a disk compact graine, or berhaps speaking more correctly, of what geologists call syenite. The principal object of adoration is the impress of the foot of the god Vishinoo, as he stamps on the herast of a fabilities deamn of enormous size, whose head is said to be under the great temple at Bondii Gyah, and lower extremities under two hills named the Rimshilab and the Pritcillab. A statue for image of Abilihab Bligge heiself has found a place, lessele some of the of Alulhah Blazee herself has found a place, beside some of the detres, in an adjuning temple; thus bringing, within our own cognizance, or maxance of the apoliteosis of a goddess, or the chromization of a sami,—I believe the former to be the more correct expression, in the present Distance.
- The Veu'ns or Bedahs, the sacred witings of the Hindons, are, I believe, of the two descriptions, the Bedahs being the scriptiones themselves, and the Shasters a sort of commentary, little less theurselves, and the Sacred, than the original.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Gazette of India of September 7 contains the three following Proclamations by the Governor-General in Connecil. They are numbered 1697-E, 1698 E and 1699-E, being all dated Simia, the 6th September 1895, issued from the Foreign Department over the signature W. J. Cuningham, Secretary to the Government of India.

signatore W. J. Cuningham, Secretary to the Government of India. "Whereas the territories known as the South Linskai Hills are part of the dominious of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India, and whereas the said territories, although intherto administered as appertanting to the Lower Provinces of Bengal, have not been formally declared and appointed to be subject to may Presidency or Lieutenant-Governorship, and whereas it is expedient that such formal declaration and appointment should be made in respect of the said territories:—Know all men, and it is hereby proclaimed, that the Governor-General in Council, in exercise of the powers conferred upon min by the Stainte 28 and 29 Vict., Ch. 17, Sec. 4, and with the sanction and approbation of the Secretary of State for India in Council, is hereby pleased to declare and appoint the said territories to be subject to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and further to direct that benefairth they shall be included within the Lower Provinces of Bengal."

We have quoted the three orders in full in order to point out the distinction in the wording of the first from that of the two last. In the first the transfer is duect, in the other two it is a secondary process. The Governor-General takes up the administration himself and then makes it over. Regarding the first, we will only remark that Sir Rivers Thompson had cried hunself boarse that the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor were too large for one ruler.

STORMS and floods are reported from the Bumbay Presidency. The railway was breached and traffic suspended :-

raliway was breached and traffic suspended:—

"The south-eastern district if the G. I. P. Railway between Barsi and Wardi has suffered severely from the cyclonic storm and heavy floods during Friday mght and Saturday moroning All traffic is at a standardi between Barsi and Ghangapur, and reports tend to show that the Nizam's and Southern Maliratra Railways have also suffered extensively. The rains had been much wanted for the district crops for some time, but the rainfall became excessive at Shoilpoir, where 17 inches fell in 24 hours, at one time to mickes being registered in seven hours. High winds of a cyclonic character accompanced the sturm and great destruction has been done to railway and other primetry. Accurate dealing are at present not to make being registered in seven hours. High winds of a cyclanic character accompanied the sturm and great destruction has been done to railway and other property. Accurate details are at present not known, as both the railway and Government wires are destroyed in many places. So far as can be found, the damage to the C. I. P line is far greater than that which resulted from the floods on the north-east line last year by which the Mondaw bridge was carried away and the ghat terminals were blocked in the Deccan. No fewer than four bridges are stated to be damaged or carried away, and the repairs to them will contain a large cost. Between Barts and Paken, at mile age 268, near Minhol, the Seems massing bridge, twelve spans of 40 feet each, has been half carried away, an fewer than six spans having been thrown over by the force of the swollen torrent; and close by mileage 267 the line has also been breached, but the latter has since been repaired.

The Seema bridge was carried away, the others were swept away or damaged, during Friday night or early on Saturday morning. At nulleage 318 the Bon bridge, which is a comparatively new structure, has been completely swept away. It was massive, and boilt of masority with non ginders, and consisted of 20 spans of 30 feet. THE Pains had livelihood prosecution has ended for the moment. The rule issued by the High Court at the instruce of Rai Isir Persad has been made absolute. The Chief Justice delivered an elaborate judgment. He thus interpreted section 123 of the Code of Cruminal

In it he og so, it oppears to us that it was not necessity to submit the proceedings for the order of the Court of Sessions under section 123, and that the Court of Sessions has no purshiction to interfere with the order made by the Migrarate authorised to enquire into the conduct of an habitural offender of the classes therein specified to show cause why he should not be ordered to execute a bond with smeares for his good behaviour for such period increaseding three years as the Migrarate thinks fit to fix. The court found the evidence unsatisfactory and quashed the conviction. But this is only the beginning of the trouble and rum that await Rai Isii Persad. He has escaped the present prosecution, after a hard and costly fight. But the district authorities do not believe in his innocence.

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS ----

SIR Thomas Marin has informed Renter's Agency that the Amer and the Shichzida are nightly granified with the latter's recention to England, especially by the Queen and the members of the Royal family. The Shanzida his been profoundly impressed with the greatness of England as evidenced by her manufactures and commerce. He commented frequently on the absorption of Englishmen in peaceful affairs, and their microncern in military matters. The Prince was of opinion that while the inilitary displays he witnessed were imposing spectacles, they would have equally impressed him that England was a inditary nation even if the aspect of the troops had been less decorative. Sir Thomas Mutto does not doubt that the visit will be productive of infinite good, as the Afghans will now understand that India is only one of the jewels in the British Crown. Mutual suspicious will be eradicated, and he is of opinion that when the time arrives the British Government will find a way to arrange for the diplomatic representation of the Amir in London.

> THE High Courts do not always agree. In Bengal, an examination fraud is not punishable under the Indian Penal Code. In the N-W. P. as also in Mailras, they take a different view of the law. Lately the Sessions Judge of Lucknow sentenced one Sneo Pershad to fourteen mont has rigorous imprisonment for committing forgery at the Middle English examination held in Locknow in April 1893. It was found that in collusion with a clerk, who was pardoned having turned approver, he had exchanged his nwn answer papers with another's and thereby passed the examination. The Additional Judicial Commissioner has just confirmed, on appeal, the conviction and sentence.

In the Midras High Court, before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parker the Public Prosecutor applied for a rule against the editor of the Madras Mail to show cause why he should not be dealt with for contempt of court to that he had published an article on the Kilugaioalai riots case, commenting un its ments when sub judice. The Prosecutor filed an affidavit showing that the appeal was filed in the High Court on the 25th of August, and that the alleged comment was made on the 28th of August when the case was still pending. He cited English authorities, and referred specially to the case of Surendianath Banerji, wherein it was held by the Calcutta High Court and the Privy Council that High Courts in India had the same powers as High Courts in England. He stated further that during the Sessions trial of the case a number of objectionable letters had appeared in the Madras Mail, and that in the article referred in it was stated that the Sessions Judge had gone not of his way to nonce these letters, which were incapable of being contradicted. M. Powell suggested that the article was either communicated or inspired by persons connected with the appeal. The Chief Justice observed that the matter was of importance, and as it was not necessary to read the niticle in court he would take time to consider what steps should be taken. Ultimitely he decided not to take any. He indeed agreed with the Public Prosecutor, that it was undesirable that, any remarks should appear in a newspoter concerning a case sub judice. But the judges did not think that the remarks were intended to influence them in the hearing of the appear, and that this was not an occasion which called for the exercise of the Churt's extraordinary power to ponish for contempt. At the same time the Judges regretted that such an acticle should have been published with respect to a case which must come before a Commat Bench. The role asked for was refused. In the Original Side of the Calcinta High Court, the Comsel for Ameer Knim, the late Mr. Anstey, had complained of similar conduct in a Calcutta daily, but nothing came out of it. In the Jain defamation prosecution in the Calcutta sessions Mi Justice Pigot strongly remarked on the discussion in the newspapers of a particular evidence and threatened punishment for repetition of the offence. It is time, however, that the anniquited and absurd doctrine of sub judice should formally be knocked on the head. To say the least, it is an impediment to justice. The better class of British Judges are gradually shaking off the old ideas respecting contemp. Counsel may argue on both sides and seek to mislead a Judge as regards both the facts and the law involved in a case, only when a newspaper editor takes it up for dissection, judicial impartiality incurs a sermus danger. The Judge cao no longer be sure of preserving his mental balance. Newspiper comments on cases sub judice are regarded as contempts on no better grounds than these. The contempt charged to the Bengalee was admitted by the accused and there was no argument. The Englishman's contempt, in the days of Sir Baines Peacock, in what is called Taylor's case, was fully argued. It was then shown that the hauling up of the editor and the printer could not be supported by any English precedent that was not three hundred years old. A power which no English Court had exercised for three centuries ought to be held as no longer existing. The min-exercise of power for sinh a long period, could not be due to the absence of occasions, especially in a country noted for the freedom of its press. The law of contempt in India ought to be placed on a satisfactory footing, by express legislation, if necessary, instead of being left to be gathered from musty precedents of the Tudor period.

great value. On Wednesday, he delivered his second lecture to the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men. It was based on his forthcoming book or rather the subject thereof, on two or three points of whose remarkable career he expirited or great length for the education and benefit of young men. We publish the lecture in its entirety elsewhere. It was well suited to the place, and was a masterpiece of its kind. It reminded us of the glorious days of the Bethune Society when really good paners were read and able addresses delivered by master minds with thorough grasp of their subject It was a thoughtful paper and the result of long cultured experience which the young men to whom it was addressed would do well to study and act upon. Unlike many of his class, Mr. Skrine would not dissuade them from Givernment, service to learn self-reliance in other fields of labour for their daily bread. He put before his audience the comforts and discomforts of service and pointed out how difficult it was for the friedless to get on in it. The plodding and the intriguing have always the best chance. The bright and the brilliant must go to the wall. That is a curse of service, everywhere and in every clime.

"His Highness the Maharajah of Patiala is not likely in carry away many kindly recollections of his visit to Sauthen India, as far as the Bangalore portion of it is concerned. Only the other day we were informed by a local paper that in a performance in the Cubbon Rooms, the Prince on arrival found his reserved sent occupied by a Bittish officer who refused to give it up, and the Prince left the hall after protesting against the disconitesy shown him. In the Pola Tournament His Highness was one of the unipries in the match between the Outy Gynkhana and the Gumers, when the Artillery team, according to a local report, rebelled upenly against his decision. His Highness delivered up his whistle and left the ground in high dudgeon, taking his departure from the station the same evening. It is impossible, of course, with the information to hind, to say who was to blame for such an unpleasant contretemps; but that it was most regretable every one will admit."

The Maharaja frequently forgets himself as regards the company he keeps. He may be said to court such fusuits by mixing too freely with everybody capable of riding a horse. Why, the labouring men of Fairport and its vicinity, who named E he Ochitires their withtator on a disputed point connected with one of their rough gimes, paid the king's gaberlingie more respect than English "gentlemen" have paid to the Maharaja-umpire of their own choosing. If the Maharaja were not an Indian Prince of the day, his verdict would have continuated respect. It won't do for even crowned heads in India to interfere with institutions and games that are peculiarly European.

A QUESTION has been asked whether Mr. Gladstone is not the oldest man who ever made a speech? Mr. Gladstone will be eighty-six on the 29th December next. The Emperor William in ide speeches at a greater age that this, and so did Moltke; but then it is said their addresses ought not to be classed as speeches, for they are only inflictary harangies. The parallel suggested is that of Moses. The chief of the children of Israel was a young man of eighty when he bade the slaves of Pharaoh despoil the Egyptians and match to the desert During their forty years' wanderings in the wilderness he sometimes admonshed his followers. So Moses may be taken as an mator. Surely, the glamour of greatness dons the vision of the writer. Gladstone is undoubledly great and would be so if he had no similarity of any kind with the biblical celebrity.

THE death of Mr. Satyendra Nath Palit, a chip of the old block, the youngest son of the famous Mr. T. Palit, barrister-at-law, is truly to be deplored. A junior membry of the Indian Civil Service, he had shewn capacity to rule and fell a marry to duty. The death of such men at an early age, is, in a sense, a general loss, and that is the only consolation that we can offer to young Palit's sorrowing parents.

MR. Justice Norris left Calcutta on Tuesday. At the Howiah Railway station, there was a large gathering to bid him good bye. The Anti-Vivisection Society, of which he is President, took the opportunity to present him with a farewell address. We give his reply:

"My dear, my good friends, I need hardly say that I feel flattered by the kindly words expressed in the address you have been pleased to present to me on the eve of my departure for England. I know that --- I have deserve all the kind things you have said about me. You have spoken of my career as a Judge of the High Court. In this connection I can only say that I have striven to the best of my ability to fill that high office and to fulfil its functions with impartiality, farmers and mitegrity. In relation to the Society for the Prevention of Criefty to Animals and the Anti-Vivisection Society, I have absolutely done nothing to repreach myself with. I have left mothing undone to forward their objects, and I believe that my labours have not been in vino. The Anti-Vivisection Society was in its infancy when I first joined it, and in at once gained my warmest support. I found it comprised of earnest men whose desire it was to protect the lower animals from cruefty and turnine. I believe that vivisection is against the highest laws of the Cleator. I hope your efforts to prevent such cruefty will be crowned with success. I am far from strong—it is ill-health that takes me away from this country, and I have had to brace myself up to meet you to-night. I leave you with feelings of forties. I have mide many friends during my sojourn in this country, and I quit at and them with feelings of sorties. I wish you all health and happiness and hope that the blessing of God may you all health and happiness and hope that the blessing of God may abundantly rest upon you all."

SHEIKH Bhola of Bhowampur, who was charged with the murder of his infant wife aged 11 years by cutting her threat and neck with a knife while sleeping, has, an conviction by the jury, been sentenced, by the Alipore Sessions Judge, to be hanged. The sentence is, of course, subject to the approval of the High Court. The prisoner confessed his guilt, and said that he had done the deed because of suspicion of unfaithfulness in the wife whose parents had wished to take her away. His pleader took the plea of insamty. The jury unanimously found the husband guilty of the minder of the wile.

JOURNALISM BY WAR.

Ir the utterances of the Indian Mirror be believed, it would seem that the British Government of India very often incurs dangers that threaten its very existence. Luckily, the dangers all pass away, as quickly as they arise, without the Government feeling the necessity of making any preparations, general or especial, for combatting or warding them off. The Viceroy and his Councillors might not have known it, but the information possessed by the Mirror, obtained, no doubt, at first hand, enabled it to announce with great solemnity that the Indian Government, having insulted the whole Japanese nation, stood on the brink of a precipice, for Japan, whose military strength at the present moment is as great as that of any of the first class European Powers, might not coolly bear the insult. The readers of the Mirror, however, are often treated to such dangers, and hence they went through the usual routine of their daily duties without discovering any evidence of internal agitation. The stock-market betrayed no sign of unquietness. The quotations did not go down. Fund-holders were in no hurry to sell, and none of the speculators were known to give large orders for purchase. The authorities of the Fort did not mount a single additional gun on the ramparts. The Navy did not receive any orders to watch the archipelago-for an early sight of Japanese iron-clads. The British Consul in Japan was utterly ignorant of the storm that was brewing in the retreat in Mott's Lane, Calcutta, guarded by cold lions on the gate. The citizens did not gather in groups and knots for discussing the latest general order respecting the movement of troops. There order respecting the movement of troops. There was no excitement among even the "devils" of the printing establishment in Dhurmtolla Street. For there was danger to the empire. The Mirror had espied it, though it was not bigger than the hand as it appeared on the horizon.

hant of Budh-Gya to offer to Japan by not allowing the image of Buddha which Japan had sent to be enshrined in the Temple. Every man, woman, and child in Japan was interested in the sacred image, six hundred years old, of the founder of the Buddhist faith. All Japan was watching with keen anxiety the fate of that relic. It was an unsolicited gift from the people of Japan. The Mohant, in his ignorance, did not know what he was about. The consequences of his refusal were simply dreadful. Mr. H. Dharampal, in his single person, represented the vast numerical strength of the Buddhist world. At least, all Japan was, for the nonce, embodied in him. Opposition to the will of Mr. Dharampal was opposition to the expressed wishes of Japan. The Mohant might think it safe to prevent the en-shriuement of the sacred image but the British Government of India ought to have known better. The Indian Empire of Britain, if it did not stand by the sufferance of Japan, could not safely provoke Japan, especially after the glorious feats recently achieved by her army over the well-ordered and vast military strength of China. The councils of the British Indian Empire, it must be held, were inspired by folly instead of that wisdom which the Mirror had the right to expect, considering that it was the Mirror which took upon itself to advise the authorities every day on all questions connected with the administration. The Government had no business to sit with folded hands and quietly contemplate the dire insult offered to a powerful nation by one of its own subjects. Impregnable, however, as the case was which the Mirror had put forward, unfortunately, it was Dharampal himself who, by certain needless disclosures from the witness-box, materially weakened it. The poetry of the situation was lost. It is no longer possible to invest the denouement with a tragical character. The affair has sunk beneath even the requirements of a comedy. It has degenerated into a downright farce. Read the following from Mr. Dharampal's account of the image, as elicited in cross-examination :-

"The idea of enshrining a new image in the Mahabodhi Temple first struck me when I was in Japan in the year 1893. I suggested the idea to the Japanese. The idea was my own, suggested by reading a passage in the Venayapushamala. is an old Buddhist book, several centuries old. I read it for the first time in Japan. It was quoted in the Mahabodhi journal.

"Question .- Thereupon you requested the Japanese, Mr. Asahi, to give you the image?

"Answer.—I suggested to the Buddhists there and to the Right Reverend Asahi, High Priest, that it would be better if an image be sent to the Mahabodhi Temple at Gya, as there was no proper image of Buddha. The Japanese were not unwilling to part with the image. They gave it with great delight and at the same time with sorrow.'

So, it was Mr. Dharampal in whose fertile brain the idea of enshrining a new image in the Temple had first arisen. It is not known what representafor inducing him to part with the image. Of one thing we may be certain. Mr. Dharampal never informed the Japanese priest of the difficulty there was in the way of the enshrinement of the image. than the hand as it appeared on the horizon.

The casus bells was nothing less than the affront the British Government of India permitted the Mo
Buddhists that entrusted the image to Mr. Dharmpal feel vexed or indignant at its not having been placed as yet within the Temple, the proper object of such sentiment would be Mr. Dharampal himself and not the Mohant. It was Dharampal who, by a singular act of indiscretion, invited the High Priest of Tokio to court an insult, it insult it is, which premises the restoration of the image to those very people that have parted with it sorrowfully. Read, however, in the light of these facts, the following extract from a leading article in the Indian Mirror:

"The armed resistance of the Mohant to the setting up of an image of Buddha in the Mahabodhi Temple, and that after he had once definitely consented, is an event from which very serious complications are likely to arise. It cannot be that Japan will quietly bear the gross insult, offered by this Hindu priest, and not only the Japanese, but every Buddhist, will consider the insult as given to Gautama's entire flock. When the news of the outrage reaches Japan, her indignation will be something which we would not like to picture to ourselves. The insult will be considered as given not only by a Hindu priest or the Hindu people, but also by the British Government of India. If the Government take no immediate action in the matter, it will at once alienate the sympathy of Japan, China and Siam, and political consequences may ensue for which it is not prepared. After the recent occurrence at Budh-Gya, the continued possession of the Mahabodhi Temple by a Hindu Mohant will lead to dreadful results."

We do not know which to admire most in the above passage, its rhetorical eleverness or the assurance of the writer in thinking that his sentences would really frighten the Government into immedrite interference with the management of the Temple. The Mohant's opposition to Dharampal is nothing less than "armed resistance," He had never consented to the placing of the image within the Temple. Yet the poor man is represented as having aggravated his offence by resist ance after having once definitely agreed to the scheme of enshrinement. Mark the excitement into which the writer works himself as he proceeds. At first, the "armed resistance,"-which, if we are to believe Dharampal, consisted of the Mohant's mukhtear having gently touched Dharampal's shoulder for calling his attention to what he was shoulder for calling his attention to what he was saying,—is spoken of as likely to cause "serious complications." Soon enough the resistance takes the form of a "gross insult to Japan," which Japan "will not quietly bear." The picture of Japan's wrath, it seems, does not satisfy the writer. Probably, it is not sufficiently frightful. Hence the bringing in of every member of "Gantama's flock" as having been insulted by the insult to Japan. Even this seems to be tame. The "insult," therefore, undergoes a quick transformation. It becomes "an outrage" pure and simple, and Japan, instead of quietly bearing it, will, we are told, discover "an indignation" such that the writer actually fears "to picture it" to himself. One would suppose that the writer must have been the victim of Japanese indignation, at least once in his life; that Japan is noted for having invaded Bengal at least once, carrying fire and sword before her, and raising pyramids of human heads like Tamarlane; otherwise the reluctance of the writer to even picture to himself the indignation of Japan would be thoroughly inexplicable. Having succeeded in frightening himself very satisfactorily,—to a measure which the whole Theosophical brotherhood may be expected to approve,—the writer veers round and strives to show who the real culprit is to whom the outrage should be ascribed. It is not the Hindu priest that is the author of the outrage on the Buddhist world. No; not even the Hindu people of India. Japan, in her wrath, will never think so. On the other hand, that great military empire of the East will identify the British Government of India with the outrage. We are not told the reason why Japan would take such a truly logical view. Never mind: the fact is there, Japan will view it in such a light. And then? Why, the Government should immediate ly interfere; else, "political consequences may ensue for which the Government is not prepared." Probably, the Mirror is in direct communica-tion with the Mikado. Not content with this, which for such a weak Government as that of Britain in India ought to be sufficient, the writer winds up his observations by telling the Government that the continued possession of the Temple by its Hindoo owners, will simply "lead to dreadful results."

Surely, India ought to be proud of such journalism!

DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

[A Lecture delivered, on Wednesday, the 11th September, hv Mr. F. H. Skrine, I. C. S., at the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men.]

Books console: but they do not teach, said a great novelist: Experience must come of ourselves. There is truth in the dictum with regard to fiction at least: but it cannot be held to apply to biography. It is possible to gather useful lessons from the career of a good and great man, faithfully recorded. Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerje, whose life I am about to publish, merited both epithets: and if he did not rise to supreme excellence the fault lay, not in his intellectual powers but in a delective moral and physical training.

It may be said with perfect truth that the most important factor in Mookerjee's complex character was his pride of birth and race. He was a Brahman of the Brahman, and refers again and again in his letters to his illustrious descent, his claim to represent the Rishis of old. I am not one of those who underrate the advantages of good birth. A distinguished family is an organic growth. Each of its members lives in long past times when he glances back at his ancestors and looks forward to surviving in his descendants centuries after his little life is sped. Thus he enjoys an eterinity of the zgo and death is robbed of half its terrors. There are few sensations so strange or so profound as those evoked by a succession of family portraits, when we find traces of the same passions, the same experiences as site our own individuality in some well ruffed gallant of Queen Bess's days or in some divine of the last century tricked out in the majesty of a full-bottomed wig.

or a full-bottomed wig.

The old French nobility, which as a social and political power, was annihilated by the Revolution, affords a typical example of the advantages and drawbacks of an aristocratic system. Their most impressionable years were spent in sumptuous and artistic surroundings and in early youth they came into contact with all that was worth knowing or contemporary society. They had a lofty if somewhat narrow conception of public duty leading them to abandon the grandeur of Versailles and the intellectual delights of Parisian infom for the sordid hardship of war; and pour out their life blood without stint at the bilding of their sovereign. But growing up as they did in an atmosphere of servile flattery, they naturally enough regarded all outside their pale as made of coarser materials than themselves: A story is told of a great lady in those old days, who in the course of a morning call on a wealthy commoner, said that mankind resembled cups and saucers. The nobility was fine poreclain; the middle classes, ordinary China, and the lower common pottery. This brilliant apothegm was overheard by a footman, who when told a few minutes afterwards by his mistress that her ladyship wished to see the children of the house, bawled out at the top of his voice from the hall so as to be overheard in the drawing room, there Pottery, bring young China to be kissed by old Porcelain!"

This mental atitude was affected by King Louis the Fourteenth and his great grandson the fifteenth of that name. Alfieri, the Italy, visited Paris towards the close of the latter monarch's interminable reign and was presented at court. He tells us in his memoirs that he never forgave the air of lofty pride and usulence with which the Most Christian king received him. It was as if a Brubdignagian were to look down on a mortal of ordinary stature and ask "what curious insect may this be?" Let those who are well born or of high caste vigilantly check the growth of sentiments which lessen their sympathy with others doomed unlike themselves to live a few years of sorrow and then to be clean

Another drawback of high inherited position is the absence it involves of any stimulus to exertion. John Bright defined happiness as "congenial occupation with a sense of progress" and we must all remember that there is no standing still in this world. We are lated to progress, or to fall behind in the race. It was said was more to be piried by a thinking mind than a young, rich, healthy and handsome Duke, for he had nothing to wish or strive for. When the storm of Revolution began to rage, there was no one in power, from the unhappy King Louis XVI downwards, who had enough resolution and power of initiative to attempt to control it, and dominion slipped from the impotent hands of men paralysed by self-indulgence to these first the self-indulgence to these first the self-indulgence to these first the self-indulgence to these first the self-indulgence to these first the self-indulgence to the self-indulgenc men paralysed by self-indulgence to those of the dregs of the people. The Reign of Terror and the guillotine which have eternally disgraced our civilization were the inevitable result.

Elucation of the highest type can alone give the required breadth of view. The noble who has had that inestimable advantage weighs his own infinite littleness in the great scale of creation. His heart goes out to his fellows less favourably placed, and he lives under, an ever present sense of the colligations he owes society which has given him such enormous power for good. I was much struck by a remark made by the late Earl of Derby when asked how he could spare so large a portion of his time to public affairs. "I consider", he said, "that men like me are amply paid in advance for anything they can do for their

To those who enjoy the still greater advantages of being born in a "golden mediocrity," slike removed from the temptation attending great wealth and great poverty, I would preach the necessity of clearing their minds of snobbery and prejudice. Learn to judge clearing their minds of snobbery and prejudice. Learn to judge men as they are, apart from the accident of birth and riches. A menial servant who does his duty is more worthy of respect than the highest noble who neglects it.

Civilization, as it advances, continually broadens the circle of our perception and sympathies. From the family they extend to the community in which we are born. And with Mookerjee, pride of race was nearly as strong as pride of bith. The former is a quality of which I would fain see a good deal more in Indo-Aryans. It is at the root of all national greatness. Without it the consummation of the Congress's wildest dream would bring only bitter disappointment. How can men be expected to work their own political salvation when they are constantly having it drilled into them that they are a people devoid of truth, honesty and ed into them that they are a people devoin or train, money me courage—when they meekly acquiesce in the reproach, and do no-thing to redeem it? Remember, that you are the descendants of a conquering race which once gave laws and science to the eastern world: and strive to live up to the high standard attained by your ancestors. Personal and national self respect have enabled the inhabitants of a small group of islands in the icy North to overspread the world. I have long endeavoured to foster this feeling in Bengalis, and my forthcoming book will be a protest against the impeachment of an entire people by Lord Macaulay. It is with this object that I have consistently encouraged the It is with this object that a new finding which tends more to ennobling thoughts, or removes the soul more completely from the sordid surroundings of daily life than the taking part, either as actors or spectators, in plays based on national history and traditions. No education is more effective or more easily acquired. The greatness of England at the commencement of this acquired. The greatness of England at the commencement of this century was in no small measure due to the devotion of the people to the magnificent historical dramas of Shakespeare. They sound as a clarion call to deeds of glory.

So much for the inherited influence, which did so much to ape Mookerjee's career. I will now pass to his early training.
Mankind is an epitome of nature, which we see eternally convutsed by the contending influences of good and evil. On scarching the depths of our own hearts, each of us must be conscious of the truth of this remark. But we are all creatures of habit: and in early youth, while the mind is still plastic and impressionable, we may be trained into a habit of acting and thinking sanely. By constant vigilance a child may be taught to repress his inherited bins towards evil temper, untruthfulness or love of self, and acquire bias towards evil temper, untruthlutness or love of self, and acquire almost instinctively the opposite qualities. Children are not play-things but citizens in embryo. I have lived to see a complete revolution in their treatment. When I was a bov, the spirit of the Middle Ages still ruled in the nursery. Children were relegated to a distant part of the house and the society of menials.

They entered their parents' presence on sufference, as it were, and on condition of being "seen and not heard" as the saying ran. At very tender age they were sent to a boarding school where the rations and discipline were more than Spartan. Lord Albemarle when a child at Westminster school, awoke on a bitter winter's morning to find his bed covered with snow which had difficed in from the broken windows. had drifted in from the broken windows. My grandfather was also at Westminster and I remember his narrating how, detected in said and sentenced to be thrown out of the window. The height was fifty feet from the ground and a row of spiked palings awaited him below. And so the child was thrust into space. He clung desperately to the widow sill and one of his tyrants hammered his little hands with a dictionary to make him let go! Happily for him and me, a master was attracted by his piercing shricks and intervened at the nick of time. The result of the stern discipline which prevailed in the nursery and school-room two generations back was that the weaklings were killed off: the sensitive crushed to semi-idiotcy; but a virile race survived whose exploits are the brightest page in our annals.

In the present day the pendulum has swung in the opposite direction: childhood is ideally happy: and the little ones are perpetually in the society of the elders. I cannot but think that this theory of education is as far removed from the true one as was the obsolete The capacity for enjoyment, for forming new impression is now exhausted before the teens are reached; and priggery is and leads to anti-social excesses. The effect on the physical nature of indulgence and pampering is equally far-reaching. To this cause is due the excessive mortality from enteric fever amongst those who are entering active life. Sir W. Hunter once remarked to me, "The present generation of Englishmen is not great because they have never learnt to suffer.

In Bengal the treatment of children has always been akin to that which now dominates Europe. And in the case of an only child it is the strongest character alone that emerges un-scathed from the ordeal. How rarely have parents the moral courage to punish a child for glaring disobedience: to withhold indulgences which their own common sense tells them are injurious. It is told of Charles James Fox that when a boy, his father, the watch of rare and costly workmanship. "Father," said the lad, after listening entranced to the melodious chimes rung out by the mechanism, "I should so like to smash that watch!" "Should you, my dear?" said Lord Holland. "Then smash it by all means!" And so the future statesman flung the unoffending watch on the marble floor and trampled it under foot with ferocious That Fox's genius was dimmed by degrading vices and that he sank into the grave ere his prime had been passed, was due to this criminal indulgence. How many moral wrecks do we see around us from the same cause! In Mookerjee's case that waywardness which marred his highest effort and led him to mistake his waruness which marred his highest enort and ten him to mistake his true vocation in life till he was well on in middle age, was due to the defective home influences. But if Mookerjee was unfortunate in this respect, the disadvantage was almost neutralized by his happy school career. At the Oriental Seminary he came in contact with lads more advanced than himself and literature for its own sake, and not as a key to worldly position. I have often regarded the curriculum of the class room as a sort of scaffolding round a building in course of erection. The scaffolding enables the structure to assimilate and make the best use of materials brought to it; but it does not support nor is it a part of that which it surrounds. The most precious and enduring lessons which a youth can learn are those which he acquires outside the walls of his school and education should be to a great extent cooperative. Mookerjee's taste for letters was formed by associating with school fellows had already acquired one: and his great intellectual gifts enabled him to outstrip them. Had he enjoyed the advantages which this Society offers, depend upon it his progress would have been still Society offers, depend upon it his progress would have been still more rapid. Logic, precision, cloquence, all can be gained insensibly by discussions in hours of freedom: and in no other way. An influence still more benign was shed on him by the Principal of his next school---the Metropolitan College. It is touching to find of his next school.—the Metropolitan College. It is touching to find in his letters written forty years afterwards, repeated references to the obligations he was under to this teacher of genius. He calls him his "guiu" and acknowledges that his passionate love of poetry, his keen appreciation of style in prose were due to Captain Richardson's informal lectures on English literature delivered to all his pupils who cared to attend them at his home out of school hours.

I have already asked you to observe the radical changes which a generation has effected in the surroundings of childhood. An equally marked revolution has taken place in the relations between teachers and pupils. In times within my memory there between teachers and pupils. In times within my memory there was a great gulf separating the two classes. Each regarded the other with suspicion unredeemed by sympathy. Masters considered boys as young savages to be avoided outside the class-room; and boys retaliated by treating masters as if they were their natural enemies.

These strained relations, to put it mildly, were due to the theory on which education was based -an unspiring use of the rod. Dr. Keate of Eion was a typical headmaster of the last age. A orilliant scholar and an admirable teacher for lads of exceptional parts, inflexibly just, he was also inflexibly severe. On one occasion, when he discovered that a school mutiny was brewing, he had sixty boys dragged from their beds on a winter's administered to each in succession a hearty flogging Nor was this severity confined to those of tender years. Young thus ignominously patished. Many a young spirit was broken by this brutal severity. Charles Reade, Captain Marryatt, the novelists, and a host of others bear testimony to the fact that the cruel discipline of their school days east a shadow on their whole career. It is to Dr. Arnold, the Headmaster of Rugby school, that boys of the present day owe the lifting of the shadow which darkened their grand-fathers' lives. He was a man of genius with the exquisite sym-ty which genius alone can give. These qualities prompted pathy which genius alone can give. These qualities prompted him to step down from the pedestal of the schoolmaster, to treat boys as reasonable beings with a sense of honout, and to seek their friendship. His overtures were at first received with suspicion, so accustomed were his pupils to the apposite theory of education. But perfect love finally cast out feat; and Arnold not easy lives in the hearts of his old boxs, but he profoundly influensed the whole scholastic system of England. Happy are his mitators, and thank God, they are many! There are no friends so delightful as the vonng Napoleon the First told a court lady that, in his experience, we begin life with a roseate tady that, in his experience, we begin life with a roseate vidover our eves and, that, as years went out, it grew darker and darker. The great Captain's own cateer is an instance of the truth of this remark. We all secont with generous impulses, with optimistic views of men and things, and end our journey disappointed, disillusionised and fortunate it we are not sourced by the titals and buffering we undergo. There is no surer preservative against the selfishness and cynicism of middle age than associa tion with minds yet unspoiled and open to noble sentiments.

There was a fatal detect in Mookeijee's training, however. was one-sided, comtemplating only a stimulus to the mental faculties and neglectful of the "casket of the soul." Education, says Milron. should fir a man to play his part successfully in war as well as peace. His thews and sinews must be harlened, and his physical ourage developed by out-door games and the assidnous exercises of the gymnasium. If the Greeks have given the world almost every tring that we have worth possessing, it is because their education was conducted on broad and a portific lines. A preception of this first appears to have extered the initial of our modern pedigogues, ending them to encourage sports by every means in their power. But with our national proclivity towards excess in all we attempt but with our halloma processing flowed as excess in an we attempt this devotion to cricket, football, rowing, &c., is in danger of being overdone. Play, says Heibert Spencer, is a redundance of faculties given us for the support of the organism. And so explorant are these faculties that severe watchfulness alone can keep them within due bounds and prevent what should be a relaxation becoming the main business of life. Why are G iman slowly costing Englishmen from many markets of the world? Because t'eir youth does not spend morn to dewy eve in tennis, golf or cricket, but works persistently with an eve to the main chance. This swing of the pendulum towards athletics is another of t e silent revolutions which our generation has s en in matters s holastic. In Bengal, fifty years ago, such things as games or manly sports were confined to the English population, and the most that was tolerated in native schools was dandright, a of rudimentary cricket. Mookerjee's leisure was spent in reading and discussing knotive school tellows. Thus sedentars study, omnivorous points in literature with his school habits were formed and muscular and organic digeneration set in at no early period of his life H: was always a weakling, subject to ing, subject to severe illness, and he did long before intering the confines of old age. His fare was shared by countiothers of his and the succeeding generation. For, it is only only in the last few years that Bongah school and College students have been inoculated with a healthy bias towards I regard it an era of the most hopeful signs of the rimes, this keen interest in cricket and football which I see on all No important match fails to artract a deuse throng of ators of the curdent class, and it is pleasure to note the agerness with which they watch the varying fortunes of the mimic war. I sincerely trust that the Marcus Square Playground which Young Calcutta owes mainly to the far-seeing sympathy of your founder and patron, His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, will include a well-equipped gymnasium amongst its attractions. If systematic drill formed a part of every school's curriculum and the cost of a cricket and football ontfit were Jeemed as legitimate a charge on its funds, as blackboards and maps, we should soon see the reproach of effeminacy removed from the inhabitants of The brain must be nourished with healthy blood; sinews developed by constant use, and sourage sustained by games of strength. I am persuaded that studies would not suffer from the new departure. There is nothing so destructive to all the powers of body and mind as the habits engendered by "loafing" during hours of recreation.

Well, I have carried my hero through the most critical part of his life and shown him to have been but imported by equipped for the coming struggle. He had now before him the all important question of the election of a career; and as it is one which must be perplexing the majority of you at this moment, I will devote the short remainder of my lecture to discussing it.

What shall we do with our sons? is the fathers' exceeding we do with our sons? is the fathers' exceeding great and butter civ throughout the civilized would. The operation of the law first connectated by Maltinus that population tends to outstrip the mains of subsistence has produced a congestion in all professions open to a youth who has received a sound general education. Here the field of choice Is even more limited than in the countries of the west Take England for instance. A paler familian in that happy land can weigh the chances of success for his young hope in presented by the "the ral professions," as they are still called, namely, the Army, Navy, Church, haw and Medicine. He can make his son an architect, a civil engineer dealing with the mechanical, marine or electric branch. Commerce offers a score of avenues to success in life. He can train the boy as an artist or an actor or journalist. Lastly, and it is a bad last, in his estimation, there is the Civil Service of the Crown. In Bengil, for various reasons which I cannot well enter into here, the field of choice was and still is, much more restricted. It is practically narrowed down to the legal profession, medicine, commerce and the civil service of the state. As regards the first, access to the so called higher branch is barred, in the case of orthodox Hindus, by the necessity of crossing the Black Water and living for years amongst mhebibar on forbidden food, involving the loss of caste and the degrading ceremony of prayactura. Cynts declare that impulence is the best passport to success as a barrister, and cuming smooths the upward path in the solicitors' calling. I am not one of those who level cheap sarcasm at an indropensable, and if exercised, an honourable calling. This kind of thing, for instance, from a home paper . "On Saturday last, a shark was east ashore at Plymouth. The attorneys of the town wept over him and buried him with all the honour due to a member of their profession. The great drawbacks in the case of attorneys are the interminable period of probation and the heavy cost attending it, as well as fact that there are at least twice as many solicitors in Calcutta a the volume of litigation really demailds.

This criticism applies with at least equal force to the pleaders' profession. There is not a bar library in the Province, and hardly a sub-divisional headquarters that does not contain a crowd of briefless ones, sourcet by the heart suckness of deferred hope. Thus, in many cases, when success comes, the mind has lost its elasticity and enthusiasm and is equally unifiered to make the best of opportunity or to enjoy its task. Medicine I regard as a still nobler profession, but here special aprilides and a primitar physical formation are necessary. In India all medical men most be what are known at home as "general practitioners" equally adept at composing a prescription and wielding the lancet. Now the physicals's science has not advanced greatly since the days of Hippocrates. His plannar opera is infinitely wider and great impossiments have been introduced of late years in the methods of a liministering drags; but treatment is still more or less enjoine ind the causation of disease is still wripped in mystery. It is far otherwise with the surgeon's craft; and those whose professional enting it has enabled them to summount the horrors of the dissociation for the operation of him who posities in, will it it is says the column of human misery. But for the migority of men the ordeal is too severe happy in b longing to a profession which gratifies the attistic sense of him who post two six, with it is sens the volume of himson misery. But for the majority of men the ordeal is too severand medicine as a profession in model, is to be ever crowded.

Comminice requires cound, which is by no in an an abundant in the modelle and upper middly closes. The competition of European (not necessarily English) troders is duly growing keener and profession protonately reduced. Nor is money alone the sinew of war in the career. In Ignicial Scalled for, calminess, knowledge of men and that which the French call. June, an instinct which leads its happy possessor to distinguish be ween good and bad "business" with innerting accuracy. The more I see of the world the more convinced I am that what is commonly called "lock" By an innerting influence on our career. How often do we see vere ordinary people, of whom it is said that everything they touch turns to gold. On the other hand, there is a class which seems to be perseented by an evil dectiny. The first Baron Rothschild, who must be admitted to have been a good judge, raid, "whatever yould, have no concern with an unlicky man. I know many, gifted with every quality which ought to ensure success, who are walking about London with stockings showing Indians embarked on mercantile careet than we see at present, for openings were more abundant and people had not been killed by the telegraph. Commerce, fifty years ago, was still conducted in the leisurely and anstocratic fashion which the Honourable Company Times have changed, and not wholly for the better.

There remains the service of the State: which is the great aim and object of our vouth. Here, the field has widened enormously within the last forty years. I have uncarthed, amidst the mountain within the last forty years. I have innearthed, a midst the mointain of rubbish which encumbered my office, a copy of Thacker's Directory for 1855, the very year in which my subject was meditating a plunge into active life. I find that there were only 159 natives then employed under the Bengal Government in posts which we should now call "gazetted," and the pay in very many of them was under 100 per mensein. I have not had time to wade through the last issue of the Civil List, or to extract figures for comparisons; but I should say roughly that at least ter times as many appointments of analogous grades are now held

This is a subject on which I may speak with the assurance of intunate knowledge. I have been for nearly a quarter of a century in the service of the Crown and my Indian career is drawing to a close. Looking back on it I may honearly say that with many shortcomings it has the approval of my own conscience, which is more to be desired than that of all the world besides. I have been privileged to do great good to those entrusted to may care. Having no ambition connected with office; in spite of many disillusions and disappointments, I am not a disappointed man. It is only right that I should state these facts, in order that you may not be under the impression that the remarks I am about to make refer to myself.

In deciding whether you will seek to serve the state, you must ponder well on the personal equation. Now, as the old Romans taught us, civilized man is a double entity. There is the man himself with his habits, tastes and passions, and there is his legal and social garb which they called persona and we should loosely translate as his antecedents. If you are proud, sensitive and passionate, without unusual power of self control, shun public service, for many and bitter will be the shocks to your amour propre and your spirit may be crushed for life. If you have brains and energy beyond the common herd, beware of letting them and energy beyond the common herd, beware of letting them thine too brightly. The mediocre, who form the bulk of any community, resent the possession of either as an insult to themselves. You will thus avoid making enemies, even if you make no friends: though Lavater save that he who goes through life without making a friend or foe is a very poor creature. supposing your mental hide is tough as the rhinoceros's, that your disposition is phlegmatic, your methods cautions in the extreme, ou must still pause before seeking to serve vour country.

For, to succeed, you must either have what Philistines call "interest," or join a mutual admiration clique. The first is For, to succeed. vastly more important than most people suppose, and cre I leave India, I may be induced to make public some very curious instances of brilliant success due solely to this potent factor. If you have relatives or connections high in office, and ready, with the infinite lamily affection of Indians, to hold out a helping hand, then you begin life with the same advantages over a friendless lad as a swimmer with a curt bolt has over him who tinsts to his unaided muscles. The one is supported in spite of his shortcomings: the other heats the waves till he sinks exhausted.

Cliquism and "log rolling" are powerful aids to advancement:
but they involve a sacrifice of one's self-respect and a weakening of one's principles; and men of the highest type prefer failure to suc gained by such means. Amongst aids to success as a public servant, I may enumerate commanding talent plus opportunity. The one is uscless without the other. Napoleon the Great must have turned his sword into a pruning-hook or died a half-pay officer but for the marvellous chances of the French Revolution. And it is equally certain that Napoleon would have been expelled with ignominy from any graded Chill Service. As I am not addressing an assemblage of intellectual grants, I will glide over this branch of my subject with precipitancy. Having this counterted the externals of an official career, I will conclude by stating its more salient effects on the individuals. In the first place, the constant sense of power strengthens the will and elevates the personality. Micaulay tells us that authority is as respectable in a constable as a sovereign; and servants of the Crown, whether engaged in dispensing justice or in executive functions, feel instinctively that they have behind them the majesty of law and the truesistible force of the empire. This is magnificent training, especially it one gets to look at all power as a trust for the public good. public good. The receipt of a fairly adequate salary and the assur-ance that the evening of life will be spent in comfort and that that those dearer, perhaps, than life can never suffer want, removes the most carking of cares, those connected with money matters, and enables a man's best energies to be devoted to his duty. These are the chief advantages of office; the drawbacks are the confusion which it brings into one's morals. There is a vulgar proverb regarding the imperviousness of a corporation to the calls of conscience which I will not quote here: but which applies with equal force to public servants. Such develope in time an official conscience which is of the most elastic description : leading them to commit actions which are not in accord with the canons of honour, and in a private individual would be severely reprobated. Friendship is difficult, if not impossible, in a service where seniors are regarded as depriving one of earned promotion and unpleasantly constitutes that juniors have much the same way of looking at things. I might mention the irksomeness of heing tied by hide-bound rules as to leave and the discomforts of the nomad life which an official leads. But time fails me; and I will conclude by expressing an earnest hope that you will all purchase Mookerjee's life, in order to see how far he succeeded solving the difficult problems involved in the choice of a career.

SIZE AND STRENGTH NO DEFENCE.

SIZE AND STRENGTH NO DEFENCE.

Here's a point for you to think over: Size and deve opment have nothing to do with health. A man my stand six feet two inches to his stockings and have the muscles of a pize fighter, and yet be an essentiancy until hithy man. His frail-hooking wite may be really the better of the comple; she may easily do more work, endine more exposure, be it more grief and worry, and omive her hig husband. There is a mystery in this that motiony can see into. It is a matter of viribity and organisation—not of dimensions.

Tide, for example, the case of Mr. F. B. Staples, of Oakwood, Ont. He is a blacksouth; and I well remember how, when a boy I used to regard a blacksouth with awe and wonder on account of his strength. It was ferroome to see him swing those mighty hammers and pick up a heavy cartibode as though it were a child's hoop. Yet I saw only in port and understond in port.

"Some twelve years ago," writes Mr. Staples, "I became aware that the dredded disease, dyspepsia, had chosen me for one of its many victims. It is hardly necessary for me to try to describe all the different feelings that came over me. I have talked with many people suffering with dyspepsia, and they have all had ahout the same experience. Among the symptoms on which we agreed ane the following: Bid taste in the month; fulness and deadness in the stimach after estudy; getting in good from one's found; headache and palpitation of the freat; gas and some fluids from the stomach; dizzness, especially when one rises up suddenly, in benis over his work; loss of appetite; pains in the chest and back, and the weathers that comes from not earing and digesting enough food to keep the body going. All these things. I had; and you can imagine how but they are for any one; participally for a man who has got to earn bis hving by daily hard work, as in my case.

"After I found out what was the matter with me I consulted a doct of at once, and began to take the measure he gave me. I am sorry in any that someth to this his any domes, must say that it, not my opinion. No man who sures from dyspepsis; as long as I did (bout six years) will ever talk froblishy or lightly about it. Even the abelian admit it is the hardest of all diseases it keep tank of, and to cine. If it does not kill a man right out of hand, it spreads the shadow o death over him all the time he has it, and takes all the laughter our of his days.

"Well, after the doctor's medicine failed, I kept on taking anything and death our hardest specific state."

all the laughter our of his days.

"Well, after the dactor's mediume failed, I kept on taking anything and everything that was recommended to me in hones of relief. Yet none of them went to the root of the ironole. Sometimes I would feel a little better and sometimes waves, and this's the way things went on with me year after year, a dreary and amserable time. There's no money could here me to live it over again.

"I was suft in this condition when a friend, that I had been talking to about myself, advised me to my Mother Seigel's Curative Symp. I didn't know the merits of the Symp then, but being auxions to try anything that might help me, I hought a buttle from Messis. Hogg Brothers, and commenced taking it. All I can say is, that I bound sulf from the analysis of the sympthesis of the state of the daysepsis. Since then I have never had a touch of the old complaint. If there is any other medicine in the world that is able to coemishestion and dyspepsia as Mother Seigel's Symp does it, why I have never heard of it. I have recommended the Symp in inner sufficiers, and they have been more than pleased with it; and I write these histy lines in hope the publication of them may come in the inck of time in he inselit to inhers still. Yours very tinly (Singued) Thos. B. Staples Oakwood, Ontario, February 25th, 1895."

We need add but few words to Mr. Staples' intelligent and manly letter. The disease which afflicted him attacks both sexes, all ages, and all classes and conditions of humanity. Neither youth nor strength is prinof against it. It mixtates other complaints, and so leasts to fatal mistakes in treatment. If you are wise you will acquaint yourself with its character, as described in Mother Seigel's almanack, and know what to do in time of need.

THE SUNYASSEE.

BY JAMES HUICHINSON.

CANTO FIRST.

IV.

I, then, had little clerkly line;

For I was of the warror caste,*

And never wished to have been more,

But for her sake;—but that is past.

I say, I was a subher born,

And I was nie, in thought and deed,

And in the heyday of our morn,

The less we teck of caste, and creed;

And so it was—a in nd I lored!

Ah! me, that I should live to tell

The secret tale of guilt, and hell;

She was a Biahound's child!

And this alas! the cause hath proved

Of all that's dark, and wild.

- The tybe of Khettee, Chittee, or Rapoot, the caste inferior only to the Brahmins. The persons belonging to this caste are, by no means, remarkable for their learning of literary attentioners; on the contrary, they more resemble those ancient. Barons, and warriers of our non-country, who despised learning, and could scarcely even sign their own names. To this day, in those pairs of the east, in which I have resided, it is not customary for persons, of any rank, to sign their names. In letters or other documents. To supply the deficiency, persons, of the sort, are all provided with a signet ring, which they wear on the finger, on all necessary or issues, this is dipt in ink, and implied to the document, in place of the sign manual. These seals generally near the name of the person, and probably some affix, as Brindoor, (similar to our Esquire), and the date, on which the seal is eather destroyro, or taken good care of, by his heats, for very abrious reasons.
- teasons.

 † The laws or customs relating to marriage, among the Hindoos, way considerably, in different casies. In some, marriages can only be contracted between parties if the same tribe or family, beyond of conservation degrees of consaignminy; in others, the contracting prines must be of different times of family cucles. In some of the lower casies, it is considered lawful for the hisband of one sister to have dishden by another, and among some of the mountain tribes of Cutack, I have been informed, that the custom adverted in, in scripting, of several highers taking the same wife, in succession, previous. In all the socied writings of the Hindoos, and in the opinion of the people the meelies, it is degrading and disgraceful in the males of the lingles, in har connexion with the females of the lower castes; but for a unale of inferior casie to defile the daughter of a Brahmin,—is death; it it is seculege, and from having committed thus deadly offence, spring the whole of the miseries, which afterwards assail the Smyassee, in his progress through life.

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Core for Deafuess, Singing in Ears, &c., no inatter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-druins and similar appliances entirely superseiled. Addiess THOMAS KEMPE, VITORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON. v.

Thon knowest, it is a deadly sin,
Fur those, who hold the Hindoo creed,
To love or wed, except within
The pale of caste, which is their meed
Such sin was mine, and mine such blaine,
I saw but het, nor thought of shame;
Yet sometimes, I have tried in vain,
To think less harshly of my guilt,
No blood of mine flowed, in her veins,
No blood of hers, by me was split,
'Tis idle all—she heard my vow,
She trusted,—and where is she now?

VI

I was an idle stripling then, With scarce a down, on hip or chin, But smooth of face, and strong of hand, With atm well fitted for the brand ; With free, and well expanded chest, That typered to my slender waist, And hub as strught, and fleet, as ere, Yet bore a hardy mauntaineeer 1 Such was the untward tenement, To the undying spirit lent, And that was soft, yet proud and shy, And ye might trace it to my eye, The' not one foreas marked by brow, Of all, that there, thou sees't now; But these are foolish things, which yet, We cannot :-- if we would forget

Twas summer, and the drought was high, The Fulgo's bed was bare, and dry,! And often, I would seek the bank, Sull fresh, and green, of a lone tank Where Palm, and Tam roud mingling, made, From poontide heats, grateful shade.

- *It may perhaps be thought, that I have been unnecessarily minute, in describing the personal appearance of the Sunyasseem his youth, but it is to be tecollected, that vious not diessed, for some paracular occasion, the inhabitants of Bengal, and Hindousthan go about, on the ordinary affairs of life, dressed as described in the text; that is, rather more scantily, if any thing, than an English pightst, when stript for a rencounter.
- † The Enlgo is considered one of the rost sacred rivers in India It flows past Boodh'h-Gyah, within about two hundred yards of the great temple; six nules lower down, it runs under the walls of the sacred city of Gyah itself. It is one of the objects of Ifundon adoitation. In summer, its bed, which is nearly a mile broad opposite to Gyah, is often almost, if not intrely dry; but in the runy season, it is a bold, sweeping stream, and would be considered a fine river, in any country, in which large rivers are incommon.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postat money orders, it possible, as the satest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Debartmont. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

There rose, with feathery has
The Banian, with its st
And graceful Betely.
Till scarce a ray could pe
All these, in wildest order chi
Around the bosom of the lake.
The taugled, and umbrageous brd
Seemed framework of some mirror vast.
Hiding it, from each vulgar guest,
Till scarce a ripple stirred its breast;
While, in its glassy depths below,
The picture smiled, with mellowed glow.

VIII

Twas there, I loved to muse an hour, And watch the damsels sport, and cower, Anid the cool, and hield tide. That mellowed, what it could not hide The blushing charms, that half revealed, Their chinging drapery ill concealed : And there, I saw my Lilloo first, A day both blessed, and accurst, Amid them all, she had no peer, From rival, she had nought to fear : In all the charms of youth, she stood, Just budding into womanhood-Her stately form, I marked her well, Was taper, as the cypress tree, And graceful, as the wild gazelle, And all, a woman's ought to be.

IX.

Like Gunga, rising from the wave, Or Rhemba, from her ocean cave,t With diamond dew-drops spangled o'er. Tired of the bath, she sought the shore-She wrong the moisture, from her hoir, That down her back, in ringlets, fell, Hiding her shoulders, like a veil, Then spread it, to the snuny air ; The Saree's graceful folds put on, And soon her simple toilet done, I She placed her pitcher, on her head .--Her milk-white rabe she closer drew, Around her face; then with a tread, Salight, so buoyant, and so mue, Might wake, in courtly dames, a sigh, I saw her homeward hie !-- 8

A PEEKLYAMAZ

THE Civil Courts are at rest. The High Court, Original Side, closed for the annual vacation including Mahalaya, Durga, Lukshui, and Kah Pujas, and Bhrairidiya and Jagadhatri and Kartic Pujas, on and from Wednesday, the 11th of September. It will resume its sittings on Thursday, the 21st November. There is no continuous long holiday for the Insolvency Court. It will sit on Saturday, the 5th of October, and Saturday, the 30th of November. The office of the Court, Original Side, closed for general business from Wednesday, the 18th of September, to be re-opened on Munday, the 18th of November. General business does not seem to include taxing of bills, for the Registrar, as Taxing Officer, was working on the 19th September. One Judge will teman in town for urgent business and arrangements have been made for the attendance of such superior and subordinate officers as may be required for the purpose.

The general holidays, for all but the excepted offices, are from the 23rd September to the 4th October inclusive. The Public Debt Office, the Government Sivings Bink, and the Government Account Department at the Bank of Bengal will be open for the transaction of business and for the receipt and payment of money on Government account on the 23rd, 24th and 30th September and 1st and 2nd October. The Paper Currency Office and the Comptroller-General's Office will also do business on the above dates. The Custom House will partially observe the holiday on the 25th, 26th, 27th and 28th September and 3rd and 4th October, when it will be open free of charge (on a day's notice being given) from 11 A. M. to 12 noon for entering or clearing vessels and for the use of bills of entry or shipping bills covering free goods from or to the same, the Treasury being closed. Mr. Skrine's book just published-" An Indian Journalist being the Life, Leiters and Correspondence of Dr. Samblin C. Mookerjee" gives some napublished private conrespondence on the subject of the Long Huliday, in the year 1889 when it was decided to keep certain offices open. Colonel Ardagh, Private Secretary to the then Viceroy's letter (Sept.) in Dr. Mookerjee, who championed the movement for the closure of offices, explains why Lord Lansdowne gave his sanction to the cuitailing of the Puja vacation, for which the Bengal Chamber of Commerce had agitated for years without success.

THIS week the English mail was delivered in Calcutta on Tuesday, and left it the next day. This change of the departure of the inail from Tuesday to Wednesday will continue for the present.

THE Law Member is spiken of as the next probable Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court.

Santoo Mather, a leper of Watgange, like many of his class, lived by begging. But his disease assuming a foundable shipe he was obliged to keep home. To rid himself of his adments, the more so as he was deprived of the only means of subsistence, he cut his throat with a kinfe to end his existence. The wound was not deep and he recovered under medical aid which was forthcoming. He was won back from death that he might be tried for attempting suicide. He was then adjudged Her Majesty's guest at the Anpore jail for two months, after which period he will be sent out to beg his bread, if able, or attempt another self-destruction.

THERE are three John Wilsons, two George Joachim Goschens, two William Abrahams, and two Robert Wallaces in the House of Commons. While the Goschens are father and son, the other gentlemen who are namesakes are quite innounceded with each other. One Abraham is a Welsh, the other an Irish, member. Both the Wallaces represent Scotch constituencies, and are English barristers. Mr. Robert Wallace, the member for one of the divisions of Edinburgh, is a Scotch man by birth and training, who held at one time a chair in Scotch University, but Mr. Robert Wallace, Q. C., the newly-elected member for Perth, is an Irishman by birth, antecedents, and education.

^{*} All these are trees very common in India, more particularly in Bengal. The palm, the date, and the tomazind must be familiar even to the western reader; the binian is the Frois Religiosus of botanists. It grows to a great size, and from its branches sends down shoots, which again take root in the earth, thus giving the appearance of arcades, where the tree is very large, which however is not always, nor very often the case. It is held in great religious estimation, by the Hindons. The bettel or soprace is the tree, which produces the betelmit;—it is a species of palm, rises to a great height, and is exceedingly slender and graceful.

[†] Gunga, the native name of the Ganges; in the present instance, it means the goddess, who presides over that sacred river. Rhemba is the ocean Venus of the Hindoos.

the ocean Venos of the Hindoos.

† The Since is the dress of the Hindoo women. It consists of one piece of white cloth, just as it came from the hands of the weaver, about eight or ten yards long, and sometimes a little ornamented at the ends. It is wrapped two or three times round the waists o as to allow the lower bonder to hang down, a little below the calf of the leg; a fold of it is taken from the waist, over the breast and head, which forms the only diess of the upper part of the body, among the ordinary classes. The Muosulmanee females wear pajamas or trowsers, and their toile is altogether considerably more complicated.

* The formes of the Hondon women as the laby and though perhaps.

The figures of the Hundro women are light, and, though perhaps rather small, are symmetrically formed, and their walk is, at the same time, light, easy, budyant, and stately; in short, it is the very apposite of cloddish or inelastic. When they go to draw water, for domestic purposes, they carry the guirah or picher, which is a globular vessel of brass or earthen-wave, contracted at the neck, and again widening at the mouth, either on the head or resting on one hip. These vessels are made of all sizes, but those, in general use, contain about half the quantity of an English bucket or less.

Privy Council, Huxley said:—'I intended for your benefit, to have a good look at Her Majesty, but I could not because I found, to my great discomfiner, that Her Majesty was constantly looking at me.' And well she might for among the entirent lawyers, professional politiciaus, and broad-acted nobles who gathered around that sacred board, it is not to be supposed that she had so often seen a face so stuking, or hooked upon a man whose discoveries, thoughts, and words had made so deep a mark upon his time."

MOULVI Abdus Salam, Deputy Magistrate of Howrah, has fined the proprietor of a Dispensity Rs. 5 for having sold an ounce of brandy to a customer. The facts have not been properly reported, so it does not appear whether the spirit was sold, under a medical prescription, for the use of a patient. The excise law being very sweeping, the Deputy may be technically right. But surely its a hardship to punish small sales, by registered dispensites, of unlicensed spirits, for purely medicinal pulposes.

THE following, hearing on the execution of the beautiful Charlotte Corday, the girl who de-patched Marat to the other world, is going the round. Attempts have been made to discover the real motive that impelled her to the deed. At one time it was believed that she simply avenged the death of her lover who had been executed through Marat's accusation. The current theory is that it was her country's wrongs that urged her to the bloody act. We ought not to be so blind to the claims of morality and justice as to demand admiration for the girl, although it was a monster whose heart felt the point of her dagger. For all that, it is difficult to withhold pity from one who became an assessin from the highest of motives that can influence earing humanity.

"An Executioner's Diary.—On this day, Wednesday, July 17, first year of the one and indivisible Republic, I executed Charlotte Corday. On reaching her cell in the Conciergerie, we found her writing. She looked in my direction and asked me to wait. When she had finished, she took off her cap and told me to cut her hair. Since M, de la Barre, I had not seen courage equal to hers. We were in all six or seven men, whose profession was anything but softening, and yet she was less muved tuan we were. When her hair was cropped she gave part to the artist who had taken her portrait, and some to the jailor's wife. I gave her the red shirt which she arranged heiself. As I prepared to pinion her, she requested to keep on her gloves because when she was arriested the curds were so tight that her skin was hoken. I said she could if she liked but that I could do in without hui ting her. She sunled, and saying, 'To be sure you ought to know how to do it,' held out her naked hands. These was thunder and rain when we reached the quays, but the crowd was thick. At a window of the Rue St. Honoid I saw Robespierre, Camille, and Danton. They looked attentively at the colpit, I myself offen looked at her. Not on account of her personal beauty, great was that was; but it seemed impossible that she could remain so calm and courageous. I said: 'You find the way long, I fear?' 'No matter,' replied she, 'We shall reach the scaffold sooner or later.' When we reached the Place de la Revolution, I tried to hide at from her by standing up. But she said: 'I have a right to he curious; this is the first time I see it.' She ascended the steps omably. One of my men suddenly standing to prolong the pining not sufferings for an instant. I made a sign to my man, and he pulled the roje."—Charles Henri Sanson's Diary.

He will bring pressure to bear on China for this purpose.

THE book of the month is "An Indian Journalist being the Life Letters and Correspondence of Dr. Sambhu C. Moukerjee, late editor of Reis and Rayyet, Calcutta, by F. H. Skrine, I. C. S." It ought to gladden the hearts of all Bengalis, for it is the first instance in which a European member of the Indian Civil Service attempts, for noble purposes, a biography of one of their own race who never sought the service of Government, and enters a protest against the calumny by the heedless rhetorician, Lord Macaulay, of their national character. Educated Indians, well off in life, who were expected to behave better, have remarked. What was Mookenjee that Skrine should grieve for him? To such his book is the reply. If they are prepared to lay out five rupees they will know better and be benefited. For only the dedicatory preface, the book, apart from its other merits, ought to find a place in every Bengali home. It will add a zest to the festivities of the season. May Durga shower her blessings on Mr. Skrine and his !

ORDERS have been passed to pay, on preaudit, the salaries for September, in the Government offices at Calcutta before the holidays, which commence from next week.

THE Indian Daily News says :-

"Since Sit Antony McDonnell went to rule at Allahabad, there have been hardly two possibilities as to the Belvedere succession, and the news from Simia that Sir Alexander Mackenzie is to be the next Lieutennut-Governor of Bengal is the mere statement of a foregone conclusion. That the question is definitely settled betimes, however, is matter for congratulation, if only in that it will calm the turbulent imagination of the native press, which loves nothing better than to run riet over what may be on the lap of the gods für Bengal. Sir Alexander has done conspicuously good work in Burgal and will deather. " Since Sir Antony McDonnell went to rule at Allahabad, there have gmation of the native press, which have a othing better than to run riot over what may be on the lap of the gods for Bengal. Sir Alexander has done conspiciously good work in Burinah, and will doubtless assume office in Bengal with the full knowledge that he takes up much more difficult and exacting duties. In Ludy Mackenzle, Belvedere will have a charming and accomplished hostess."

They are all, all able men, conspicuous for good work, and their sweet consorts also are all, all charming. Of that there is no doubt. But why indulge in a needless fling at the native press? As a matter of fact, it is the Anglo-Indian press that is distinguished for its forecast of future appointments. To such an extent did the former Friend of India use to include in it that it was popularly said that the Friend had men to nominate for every post under the Government, from the Viceroy down to the Treasury peon or the Public Works duftry. Those capable of reading between the lines can understand that the paragraph in the News has its genesis in certain rumours, first voiced in Anglo-Indian cricles, about the Belvedere succession, which have disturbed our contemporary's forecast as quietly settled by him long ago.

ADVERTING to the immour about Mi. Cotton's filling the Chief Commissionership of the Central Provinces, the Indian Daily News remarks,-"We can hardly suppose that Lord Eigin would place the author of 'New India' in an independent charge, without serious reflection on the probable consequences, especially with so many far sater men available." If the authorship of "New India" were the only objection, we can assure our contemporary that it is not worth a minute's thought. Mr Cotton, notwithstanding his coquetting with educated Indians, his mystical worship of Humanity, and his Positivism, is as sympathetic as Sir A. P. MacDonnell with the people of this country. The veneer of liberalism to the contrary, it has always been known, so far as action is concerned and not profession, that the Hon'ole Mr. Cotton of the Bengal Council | Street, Westminster, London, S. W.

and the Secretariat is the same individual who, years ago, in the columns of the Indian Observer, spake of the educated natives of India as "the untoward offspring of English folly."

In reply to a correspondent who had enquired what books he generally took with him on his campaigns, Lord Wolsely is credited with having answered as follows :-

"A General has but very little time for reading-at least, I never can find time-when in the field. During the Mutiny and the China War I carried a Testainent, and two volumes of Shakespeare that contained his best plays; and since then, when in the field, I have always carried

> Book of Common Prayer. Thomas à Kempis, Soldier's Pocket Book,

-depending on a well-organised postal service to supply me weekly with plenty of newspipers.

The book that I like reading at odd moments is 'The Meditations of Marcus Anrelius.

When I am gorog-on any distant expedition for a lengthened time, I should add to those I have mentioned the following books :-History : Creasy's Decisive Battles.

Plutarch's Lives. Cæsar. Voltaire's Charles XII. Cæsar, by Froude. Hume's England.

Fiction: Macaulay's History of England and his Essays."

The inclusion of Micaulay's "History of England" under the head of fiction, a contemporary remarks, is "distinctly hard on Macaulay." The fact is, Lord Wolsely is not singular in his opinion. Many persons believe that, untwithstanding their popularity, the volumes of Macaulay have not much historical value. Highly meritorious as the production is, Croker succeeded in pointing out its blemishes, many of which are, not doubt, serious. The biographer of Macaulay, his own nephew, while noticing the perfect furor of ipplanse and admiration with which the work was greeted on all sides, brushes Croker aside as an insignificant assailant unworthy of serious notice. Those, however, whose acquaintance with Cricker is at first hand, know how formidable an antagonist he was in the arena of literary controversy. No writer was more careful of his facts than Croker. His review of O'Meara's book chaiging Sir Hudson Low, the Governor of St. Helen i, with having incited him to phismi Napoleon in his exile, was a most brilliant performance. His review of Thierhistorical works was scarcely less so. In spite of his critique in the Edinburgh Review on Croker's edition of Baswell, in which he charged Croker with numerous inaccuracies respecting names and dates, Macaulay, in one of his letters to his sister, owned the ments of the book he had publicly condemned. The fact is, the brillant rhetoric of Macaulay has blinded many Indian students to the worth of Croker as a periodical writer. His review of Macaulay's History may be perused with delight and profit by every one. Considering the age at which Croker wrote that review, it was a marvel. He had been deprived of vision. He was assisted by an amaniensis in reading and miking extracts from manuscripts in the British Museum. Despite all these disadvantages, Croker, as already said, pointed ont many historical maccuracies. His remarks, above all, on the mannerisms of Macaulay, were characterised by great humour. It was Croker who first printed out that Macaulay's cavalry always came "pricking fast." They blunder also of Macanlay, that Croker pointed out regarding the account of Queen Elizabeth's address to her soldiers at Tilbury, was a serious one. For all that, it is nothing but eccentricity to class both the History and the Essays of Mucaulay under Fiction.

PRIVATE Thomas Stewart, Highland Light Infantry, was executed at the Fyzabad jad on the 12th September. The prisoner, reports an Auglo-Indian contemporary, bore himself with fortified, singing as be was marched to the scaffold "Just as I am, without one plea." It also publishes the following letter to shew that Siewart while maintaining to the last that he had no intention to commit murder admitted the justice of the sentence passed on him.

"Curporal MacMath, I have asked Mr. Elliott to write you these iew ines to tell you how very sorry I am for huiting you. You never did me any wrong. I fired my rifle off without meaning to kill or nint any one, and I did it when in dink. I know no one will believe this, but it is the trint, I know I deserve to die for what I have this, but it is the truth. I know I deserve to die for what I have done. I deserve no pity from any one, and don't look for it. I look only to God, against whom I have most sinned. I feel He has for given me. I am ready to die, but I want to see you very much before I am executed, to tell you how sorry I am for hurting you, and get your for giveness."

It is a touching letter, whatever the man in whose name it is given. This is not the first letter of the kind. Other Privates have spoken to the same time.

A WILD rumour has been for sometime affoat in town that Moulvi Abdul Jabbar Khan Bahadur, C. I. E., who had been with his family, on a pilgrimage, to Mecca, was in custody and, some went so far, that he was killed. On the 7th he wrote from Aden to say that he was safe and was on his homeward voyage per S. S. Sultan. It took him 24 days from Mecca to Medina and from Medina to Mecca on camel's hack under most trying circumstances. Last Tuursday he left Colombo. The friends of the Moulvi will be glad to hear that he is expected in Calcutta in the middle of next week. Arrangements will be made to welcome him back at the Koila Ghat.

THE Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta, being asked by the Goverument of Bengal for an expression of their opinion, submitted an earnest protest against the provisions of the Pilgrim Ships Bill. They sent up also their President the Hou'ble Prince Sir Jahan Kadar Muza Bihadur to represent the views of the Mahamedan community at the Legislative Conneil. The Prince at first took up his quarters at Mayville, but it being too high up the hills, the Viceroy offered him the Villa of Armsdell.

Rat Annada Proshad Gnose Bahader, first Personal Assistant to the Commessioner of the Presidency Division, retires from service this day, at the age of 61 years. He began, in the year 1856, as a Daroga in the old Police, on Rs. 50 per mensem. In seven years, he rose to be Court Inspector at Midnapur. In 1864, he was drafted from active service to the clerical, being appointed head clerk and sheristadar at the Midnapur Maginiracy. His next appointment, three years after, was as Assessor under the License Tax Acr. While so employed, he appeared at the first competitive Examination for deputy inegistracy held in 1868, during the administration of Sir William Grey-Having passed, he was admitted to the Subordinate Executive Service on the 21st July, 1868. By May, next year, after departmental examinations, he was confirmed in that service. He was soon promoted to the fifth grade over the heads of many of his compeets. His rise was so rapid that the late member of the Board of Revenue. the Han'ble Mr. Reynolds, then Collector, noticed the matter thus: "Accept my congrutuations upon your well-deserved promotion to the titin grade. I do not think I remember any member of your service, who has risen so rapidly, as you have."

Dawn to the year 1870, we find him employed in the districts of Hooghly and Howran. He was then transferred to the Orissa Division, where he made his mark and completed the intricate and long-pending settlement of the Town Khasmahal to the satisfaction of the Collector and the Commissioner. In 1874, he was deputed on special duty in connection with the Behar Famine, Mr. Rivenshaw, the then Commissioner of the Orissa Division, was unwilling to part with him. He wrote: "I am exceedingly sorry to lose Babu Annada Proshad, who is an exceptionally good officer, and who has now acquired very considerable experience in Orissa, and is by cast and temper peculiarly well fitted for duty in the Division. I will deem it a favour, if, when Babu Annada Proshad is no longer required for special duty, he may be allowed to resume his work in Cuttak." After the Funine operations closed, he was appointed officiating Personal Assistant to the Commissioner of the Orissa Division. Confirmed in that post in 1881, he continued as such in three Divisions-Orissa, Burdwan and the Presidency till the last, except for two brief intervals, for 14 years. Commencing with Rs. 50, he ends with Rs. 800 in the first grude of the service, retiring with a well-earned pension and the distinction of Rai Bahadoor. In his long official career of forty years, he was never found wanting in duty, and though not brilliant was always highly useful. He had five extensions of service and the last Commissioner to whom he was Assistant had strongly recommended him for another. Like Mr. Westmacott, Mr. Beames too had a great liking for the Baboo.

THE following extracts, from an advance proof from Pandit Abmash Chandra Kaviratua's Charaka, bearing on the characteristics of quacks, will be read with interest, It would seem that they, in all ages and climes, present the same features.

"They that are possessed of opposite qualifications are compinions of disease and destroyers of Life. These men, we tring the rubes of physicians, are the thoros of the world. Behaving after the manner of those whom they imitate, those persons, through the heedlessness of kings, move about in all countries.

This is their special indication, viz, clad in the robes of physicians and indulging in self-praise, they walk along the public streets, in expectation of calls.

They fear any one who wishes to consult them as one fears death itself. No one knows who their preceptor is, or who their disciple, or who their fellow-student.

(Here are some verses.)

Those men who, wearing the girb of physicians, seek to gratify afflicted persons like fuwlers seeking to capture birds in the woods by having recourse to their nets or springes, "base men who are in endued with scriptures, experience, (knowledge al) creative operations, time, measure, and place, small be avoided. They walk on the earth like the followers (nessengers) of Death.

A wise patient should always avoid those foolish men with a show of learning who for ermost their sustemance interest to the happened.

of learning who, for earning their sustenance, present to the honour of being physicfaus. They are like snakes subsisting on air."

To the above, the translator adds the following interesting notes "It is evident that the Rishi was for suppressing quacks by penal legislation. Unfortunitely, the question is not easy of solution as to who are quacks. Under most Governments, Homos ipathy is still regarded as a form of quackery. In India, under British rule, the system propounded by the Rishi himself, is regarded as quackery. Kavirajes are classed in State-returns as herbalists ;-1 fine instance of the appreciation in which the Hindu system of medicine is field by the rulers of the country! The fact is impossible of disproof that thousands of chronic cases, given up by European physicians as honeless, are cured by these despised herbalists. Dysentery, when it attacks a European, generally proves fatal in India. Yet those Europeans who place themselves under Kivitajes, get themselves cured, in no tune, of this formidable disease.

"It would be curious to ascertain what the dress was of physicians in ancient India. To this day, many physicians, who have no calls, pass and repass along the public thoroughfares in their good and handsome carriages drawn by excellent steeds, to create the impression that their practice keeps them engaged for the whole day."

When success does not attend their labours, nothing is more common for incompetent physicians than to accuse the patient of disobedience and other faults. Then, again, the comparison between quacks and snakes which subsist on air, is a very happy one, for quacks, although they have ostenishle practice, and, therefore, income, succeed in keeping up appearances. Sometimes, having made money by trade or mother ways, they invest it in lofty building, for creating the impression that their practice is very large and lucrative. In large towns where next-door neighbours do not know each other, this often succeeds in extending the practice of incompetent physicians. The mobility to name who their preceptor and fellow-students are forms another characteristic of quacks. When pressed, they name sometimes this university and sometimes that as their alma matter, although the records of the institution afford no trace of their names.

THE PILGRIM SHIPS BILL,

AN ANTICIPATORY MEASURE.

THE Pilgrim Ships Bill, as was to be expected, has created considerable commotion among Mahomedans. We have already commented on it. Notwithstanding all that has been said in various quarters that it is a measure in the right direction and that it was not intended to annoy the religious, the belief still prevails that it will interfere with Haj and that the poor pious Mahomedan will find his way to the holy shrines of Mecca practically closed to him. The Bill has been introduced not because the Government of India see any necessity for it, but because France believes that outbreak of cholera in Europe is due to the annual pil-grimage of the Faithful. This is clear from the speech of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the member in charge of the Bill. The hands of the Government of India are completely tied. We have here another example of Legislation by Mandate. The Government of India are almost sure that the pilgrimage of the Indian Mahomedans to the Hedjaz has nothing whatever to do with the spread of the disease in Europe. They emphatically declare that cholera travels by way of Russia and not through Arabia and Egypt. But all that goes for nothing. Great Britain has entered into a convention with the Continental Powers and to give validity to it the Pilgrim Ships Bill must be passed and hundreds of Mahomedans hindered in an act which they regard as the key to heaven: As will be explained afterwards more than two-thirds of the pilgrims will have difficulty in performing hereafter the Haj, which even the most sceptical Moslem is not prepared to ignore.

It is impossible for Europeans to realize the intensity of religious feeling of an Asiatic. In spite of the civilization which is growing around him, an orthodox Hundu or Mahomedan blindly sticks to the outward forms of his faith. The Mahomedan in particular zealously guards them. He has still the old faith—senseless you may call it but its existence is a fact which to ignore would be a grave mistake. Educate the people if you will, educate them in science and sanitation, but it is impolitic to press upon them a measure which is sure to be misunderstood and misinterpreted by ignorant Mahomedans.

Another strange fact in connection with this piece of legislation is that the Government of India were not properly represented in the conference held at Paris, of which it is the outcome. They deputed Surgeon-General J. M. Cunningham, on the understanding that matters regarding the sanitation of only the Red Sea ports were to be discussed. They had no knowledge whatever that any question about Indian pilgrims would be raised. According to what has been said by Sir Alexander Mackenzie in the opening speech, had they known it they would have sent some other gentleman better qualified to deal with the political aspect of the question than a mere professional. But whether they knew it or not, they must swallow the bitter pill. On June 7, 1894 the Secretary of State sent them a copy of the Convention and ordered them to at once change the law according to its terms. The Secretary of State wills it, and it must be done.

Criticism on the details of the Bill is obviously useless. The Bill was matured in London, if not in Paris, and is going through a mere routine form in the Supreme Council. Even if the Mahomedans were far more enlightened than what they are and the whole country had cried out against the proposed legislation, it would have been impossible for the Government to yield to public opinion. The English Government has entered into a contract with the other European Powers, which the entire strength of the Government of India cannot shake off. But all the same the attitude of the British Government is bardly explicable. It accepts the resolutions of the conference and thereby pleases France no doubt but at the risk of displeasing, nay wounding the feelings of millions of its own subjects.

Though any examination of the details will be unavailing, it may be of use in pointing out the radical changes introduced by the measure The most important sections are 4, 18 and 27. Section 4 defines pilgrims and includes in the term all persons of whatever age. Section 18 empowers the Governor-General in Council to prescribe the number of superficial and cubic feet to be allotted to each pilgrim and by executive order Government intend to fix it at 16 sq. ft. According to the existing Act it is only 9 sq. ft. There is another important innovation in the section which requires that the upper deck of a vessel should be reserved gratuitously for passengers. The effect of these two sections is ob-vious enough. The ship agents are not going to allow themselves to suffer by this legislation. If the legislature require an entire ship to be reserved for a few men, the ship-owners would be glad to comply with this demand, but they would, to be sure, exact as much from the few as they did before from many. With a change of 16 to 9 feet, the entire upper deck not counting as legal space, all children counting as full pilgrims and with hospital accommodation of 5 per cent. of the pil-grims on board at the rate of 32 sq. ft., per head, they must considerably enhance the fares. And what does this little fact signify? It means that twothirds of the pilgrims would be left at Bombay and thence return to their homes miserable and wretched. "Kill us on board," they would cry, "but allow us to embark. We would reach Paradise." Section 27 of the Bill empowers a medical officer on sus picion of a man's having been on attendance on or in contact with a cholera-striken person to forbid his embarkation. The discretionary power hereby vested is too great and may on occasions be arbitrarily used. It is not improbable that an enthusiastic medical officer may interpret contact in such a way as to exclude hundreds of healthy devotees.

Since the above was in type Sir Alexander Mackenzie last Thursday presented the report of the Select Committee on the Bill. We take the following telegraphic summary from the Englishman:—

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, in introducing the report of the Select Committee on the Pilgrim Ships Bill, made a long speech. He said that full reports had been received from Bengal and Bombay, and memorials from numerous Mahomedan associations Some said that the speaker had put forward suggestions which were impossible to accept, and show an entire want of appreciation of the position the British Government occupies in relation to the other Powers of Europe and Turkish Government in the Hedjaz. And while some measure as an interference with religious liberty, others were remarkable for their clear grip of the situation, and the practical common sense they bring to bear on the Bill and its rules.

Some, indeed, give a hearty welcome to legislation as calculated to mitigate materially the sufferings of the pilgrims, and scout the idea that it interferes with their faith. Sir A. Mackenzie then quoted various opinions touching on the attitude of Government towards the Paris Convention. He could absolutely deny the truth of the postulate that cholera is imported into the Hedjaz by Indian pilgrims, but there was no disputing the fact that a large number of pauper pilgrims fill the Hedjaz with a population who fall easy victims to the disease there engendered. We cannot force Turkey to treat Indian pilgrims in an excep-tional manner. They must submit to Turkish rule as modified by international agreement, and all that Government can do is to cure all reasonable protection and concessions. Sir Alexander Mackensic alluded at length to the vexed question on the probability of increased cost of passage, the matter of deck space and sanitary taxes, and concluded an excellent speech as 'The Council will perceive that the Bill on becoming an Act is not to come into force at once, but on such a day as the Governor-General may appoint. This will enable Government to recast its rules, which will not now be materially altered. On the important question of 'tween deek space and hospital accommodation, after due consideration of the suggestions and criticisms of the authorities who have reported on them, no one can, I think, object to the Bill, as it now stands. It is practically an enabling measure, leaving over details as to rules, in framing which Government will do its best to meet the reasonable requirements of its Mahomedan subjects. For the rest the Bill emodies valuable safeguards and is an undoubted boon for intending pilgrims, the necessity of which is admitted, and which would have been desirable had the Paris Convention never been devised. I hope the Council will see no reason why it should not be passed into law at the next meeting.

Prince Jehan Kadir made a very able speech, in the course of which he said :- We are grateful to the sanitary experts of the West for the interest taken in the welfare of pilgrims to the Hedjaz, but would wish that that interest were less feverish and better informed. I would respectfully suggest that representations be made to the Secretary of State for modifications to be adopted whereby the discontent and dissatisfaction of the Mahomedans at some of the present conditions of the Bill may be allayed." speaker alluded to the universal opinion that medical examination he fore embarkation of pardanashins should be conducted by women, and expressed satisfaction that Sir A. Makenzie was of opinion that a sanitary tax should not be levied in Bombay. In regard to the definition of "passenger" and the proposal to extend the defini-tion to every Mahomedan passenger of whatever age, he found it tion to every impossible to approve of it, and rejoiced that the provision was to remain in abeyance for the present. Regarding the increase in the amount of between deck space quoted by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, he was heartily glad that the law would remain on the present footing. Finally he argued that the employment of Mihomedan cooks and watermen proposed by Sir A. Mackenzie be made compulsory on pilgrim ships, and concluded by saying that he felt it his duty to draw attention to the very grave effect the enactment of the Bill as originally proposed was calculated to produce on the pooter members of the Mahomedan community, stating emphatically that it directly conveyed the impression to the ignorant classes that Government intended to operate adversely to the religions duty which induced pilgrims to visit the Hedjaz. Any increase in the cost of the journey was a most serious matter, and he requested the Government to see that such misapprehensions were not revived, and that this aspect of the case be submitted to the Secretary of State.

Dr. Lethbridge made an exhaustive and highly important speech on the Bill. He said that the question was dealt with inadequately by the Convention whose representatives were little qualified by practical experience to deal with the matter. As to the rules regarding space, he said as a specialist who had had many opportunities of becoming acquainted with the practical side of the question, that to maintain the space now demanded was unreasonable, and he still hoped that the consent of the European Powers may be obtained to the reduction of the space to 12 feet. Turning to the matter of increased cost the speaker went very fully into the question, quoting figures obtained from Bombay regarding nine steamers employed in the pilgrim traffic, and proving that if one-fifth were added to the cost of the passages in the case of three steamers and one-third or one-half in the case of the others, owners would be compensated for the loss involved by the increased space conditions. Dr. Lethbridge also touched at length on hospital accommodation and food supply, and said that the Select Committee had done all it reasonably could to meet the wishes of the Mahomedan community."

The Bill will be passed at the next meeting shorn of certain objectionable provisions. Not because the Government admit the validity of the objections raised, but because the Convention has not been ratified. They, however, prepare themselves to carry out orders whenever received by taking power beforehand. The Bill has been based on the Convention. The ground failing, the Bill is not to be abandoned. It has been said that, it is only an enabling Bill. To our thinking, that is the most serious objection against the measure.

DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

[This letter addressed to the biographer of the deceased Doctor, has been sent to us by Mr. Skrine for publication....En., R. & R.]

September 13, 1895.

Sig, --- Although I have not the honour of being personally known to you, yet, considering the nature of the subject upon which I am going to address you, I do not think I need make any apology in approaching you with this note. Being one of those who for miny years enjoyed the privilege of associating with the late Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee as an admiring assistant and collabor ateur, it is impossible for me not to take a deep interest in the biographical work which you are about to bring out. I perused carefully the sketches that appeared last year in the National Magazine and, despite the risk of offending you by presuming to pass an opinion on your work, I cannot help observing that I was much surprised at the ability displayed by you in compiling the facts and putting them together in due perspective. There is only one point about which the view propounded by you may, it seems, be misunderstood, without a little further explanation than what you have given. In your second article on Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee in the National Migazine, you speak of the Doctor as one whose natural impulsiveness was never subjected to the regulating influence of a good moral education, and who to the end of his life retained many of the chiracteristics of a spoiled child. As I never saw the Doctor in a subjidinate position, I am not prepared to say, from personal knowledge, whether there was or was not in him a natural impatience of control. But from what I have heard about his harmoniously acting as a Sub to Hurrish Chandra Mookerjee, it does not seem to me that our esteemed friend was in capable of submitting to the guidance of a superior.

Dr. Sambhu Chunder betrayed, no doubt, a great want of steadiness in the choice of a profession. As you observe rightly we find him "everything by turns and nothing long." But that was because his talents and temperament were more suited for a literary career and for curting poverty than for the high offices he was obliged or induced to seek for that wealth, power and position which they offer. When he accepted service first, he had not, perhaps, the remotest idea of the difficulties that he would have to cope with. The experience that he acquired subsequently satisfied him that it was neither possible nor worth his while to devote to the service of an Indian Prince a genius that was meant for mankind. With this idea ultimate!y as an independent journalist. In that sphere he found a position of stable equilibrium.

You have yourself shown that the failure of the lamented Doctor to maintain his footing at Murstridabad or Tippera was not due to any fault on his part. In my view his great mistake was to accept service under Indian Princes wihout the resources and qualifications necessary for success in such service. Perhaps, at the beginning his idea was that, with such ability as he possessed, he was bound to flourish in any sphere in which he would be placed. But if that was his dream in the morning of life, he was before long rudely awakened to its realities. I may here, withjout incurring the charge of egotism, tell you that my own k experiences in life were very similar to those of the Doctor, and we used sometimes to pass many long hours in comparing notes. On one of these occasions, the Doctor gave expression to the result of his official experience in a pithy epigram which may he regarded by some as misanthropic, but which only propounds an important truth. He observed that success in the court of an Indian Prince, of the ordinary type, was attainable only by men endowed by nature with an innate depravity. However disagreeable it may be to all good and virtuous men, it is one of those rugged maxims hewn from life that are worth much more than tous of schoolbook lore. Innate depravity alone may not suffice to make one a successful courtier, but it is a sine qua non, and as a man of learning and real ability must generally be without it, he is sure to be out-witted by those masters in Machiavelism that abound in every Indian Durbar.

In order to prove the truth of his doctrine, our lamented friend mentioned to me some particulars of his experiences at Murshidabad, which I think are likely to interest you as his biographer. The department of the Nizamut in which the prevailing laxity was most lamentable, and which most urgently called for reforms, was that called the Karkhana Matalag, and which, with the chief enuuch, Nawab Darab Ali Khan, at the head, had charge, among other things, of the stables. The finest elephants and horses belonging so the Nizamat were literally starved to death in order that the wretched and heartless fiends at whose mercy they were placed, might eke out an extra income by depriving them of their fodder in their lise-time, and by being deputed, after their death, to purchase other animals of the same kind. To prevent this sort of cruelty to the poor animals, and the consequent loss to their master, the minister appointed an extra officer who was a Mahomedau, and who had made a good impression on him by his Arabic learning. The new officer tried hard to justify the choice of his patron. But his appointment and his vigilance gave great umbrage to the powerful Darab Ali and his underlings. The Nazim did not like the cunuch personally. But he was an old man and an official of long standing. So the Nazim could not deny him a hearing, and, with such tricks as he and his followers had, it was not very difficult for him to obtain the sanction of his master to whatever he insisted upon. Next to innate depravity, the most important qualifications of a courtier are Zenana connection and histrionic power, and of these the eunuch, as a matter of course, possessed an abundance. He was, no doubt, not related as a brother-in law to his master. But as the chief cunuch he had far greater influence than any Queen's brother ever had. In addition to this he could express his joys and sorrows, at the required temperature with the exquisite delicacy of a scientific instrument. After the appointment of the aforesaid Moulvi he did nothing hastily, but took about a month to watch the course of events, and to mature his scheme. When the time for action came, the veteran Groom of the stables presented himself one day before his master in a very dejected mood. Upon being asked as to the cause of his distress, he burst into tears and only blubbered out the remark that he was levelled to the dust. The Nazim was naturally deeply impressed on his mind latterly, we find him settled down affected by the artistic weeping of the old man, and anxiously pressed for being enlightened with an explanation. The cunuch only continued to shed tears and his tools, who were also present at the time, then found their opportunity. They explained to the Nazim that the old man had very good reason to feel insulted by the appointment of a pauper who virtually made him functus offices, and who openly boasted of his having done so by saying that he had levelled to the dust such a big official as the cunuch Nawab Darab Ali. The Nazim inquired whether there was any evidence to prove that the new officer of the Karkhana Matalag really made the remark alleged against him. Darab Ali had, of course, a partisan present at the place to swear to the truth of the allegation. The victim of the intrigue was sent for and asked to state what he had to say. Unfortunately, in denying the charge, he took an oath by the blood of Imam Hossain. This gave an opportunity to the intriguers to rouse the sectarian hatred of the Nazim against the poor Moulvi. He was a Sunni while the Nazim was a Shia. So Darab Ali and his infamous crew at once cried out that the oath taken by the heretic was not a very serious one to him. As a Sunni it was his usual business to drink the blood of Imam Hosain. This was the crowning stroke, and it sufficed to induce the Nazim to dismiss the good Moulvi at once. The humiliation that the minister felt on the occasion can be easily imagined. What evidently pained him much more was the extinction of his hopes to save the noble animals of the Nizamat stables from the cruelty that was practised on them. The eunuch who allowed them to be starged to death had all the essential qualifications of a courtier. and he triumphed. Our lamented friend lacked those resourcess and he was easily driven to the wall, despite all his learning and administrative ability. The only ground on which he can be said to have had the characteristics of a spoiled child, lies in the fact that he surfeited himself with every kind of literary delicacy for which he took a fancy. He could never reconcile himself to the drudgery of chewing and digesting those dry bones of technical subjects which alone can qualify a man for practising with success any of the liberal professions. I believe this is all that you mean when you say that the Doctor's career was marred by impulsiveness and want of self-control. But I fear you have not been sufficiently explicit, and the observation made by you might be misunderstood. When your Life of the Doctor first appeared in the National Magazine, I did not communicate my views on the subject to you in the belief that some other friend of the Doctor, personally known to you, would draw your attention to the matter. But from the tenor of the lecture delivered by you, in the hall of the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men, on Wednesday last, it seems that nothing has happened yet to lead you to express your views with the necessary qualifications so as to preclude the possibility of your being misunderstood. Hence, though a stranger to you, I take the liberty of addressing you this note.

Yours truly. JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARYA.

Official Paper.

THE BHAGALPUR ELECTION.

From H. J. S. Cotton, Esq., C. S. I., Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal,---To the Commissioner of the Bhagalpur Division,---(No 432-A/D, dated Darjeeling, the 7th September,

Sir,—It was reported by you on the 25th of July, 1895, that the electoral representatives of District Boards of the Bhagalpur Division had met on that date, in accordance with the requisition of Government, to elect a representative for the Bengal Council, and that the delegates were unable to make any recommendation in the manner prescribed by Rule V (c) of the Regulations made under section I (4) of the Indian Council Act. 1802. 16. to recommend by a majority of votes any Councils Act, 1892, i.e., to recommend by a majority of votes any person for nomination by the Lieutening Governor as Member of the Bengal Council to represent the Division. It was found that there were two votes recorded for Mr. George Hennessvof Mutharapur in the Malda district, and two votes for Rai Surji Singh Bahadur of Bhagalpur, and the delegates placed it on record that it was impossible for them to select any candidate on whom the majority could agree, and that they were quite conmeetings would be useless, and that no vinced that further other result could be obtained.

In these circumstances it devolved on the Lieutenant-Governor under Rule VII of the Regulations---a period of more than two months having elapsed since the requisition was made---to nominate a person belonging to the class which the District Boards of Bhagalpur are deemed to represent.

Upon receipt of the report of the delegates, the Lieutenant-Gov ernor made an attempt through you to assertain the number of Board members who had supported either Mr. Hennessy or Rai Surji Narain, and it was hoped that by this means it might be possible to determine which of the two candidates for election had received the largest number of votes from the electing body. But after considering your report and the reports of the Chairmen of the District Boards your report and the repersonal discussion with both the candidates, Sir Charles Elliott found it impossible to come to any satisfactory conclusion regarding the voting power in favour of each candidate. Both Mr. Hennessy and Rai Surji Narain claimed to have received a majority of votes throughout the Division, and owing to the fact that there were several other candidates for election on whose behalf votes were given, and that in the districts of Purnea and Malda votes were recorded for delegates only, and not for candidates, it was not found possible to decide on whose behalf the largest number of Board members had voted. The Licutenant-Governor enquired into this matter personally on the occasion of his recent visit to Bhagalpur, and satisfied himself that no nomina-tion for a seat in Council made on this basis would give general

His Honor then considered whether he should order a re-election by the District Boards, or assertain from every individual member of Boards for whom he wished to vote, but he regrets to say that the Bhagalpur election proceedings have been marked by so much ter-giversation and breach of pledges, by so much wire-pulling and improper influence brought to bear upon the voters, as well as by electoral dodges; some of which were not of a creditable character, and occasionally, he fears, by practices which would not be tolerated under the law in England, that he does not consider that it would now be possible to assertain, or destrable to enquire, for which of the candidates the members of the Boards who did not record their votes at the elections of June and July would actually have wished to record them. Moreover he is convinced that it would be unwise so to re-open the whole question at a time when public feeling is much excited on the subject. It is most important that the strong and bitter feelings which have been roused by this election should be allowed to subside, and that no steps should be taken which would tend to resuscitate them.

Another alternative was carefully considered by Government, viz., to disfranchise the Division and transfer its right of election to another Division. But such penalty seemed too heavy, remembering that this is the first occasion on which a failure to nominare has occurred, or corrupt practices have been suspected; and besides it is a course which had not been provided for in the Regulations under section 1 (4) of the Indian Councils Act.

It seemed better, therefore, to fall back on the course prescribed by Rule VII of the Regulations, and in order that the District Boards of the Division might be suitably represented in Council, the Lieutenant Governor submitted the name of Maharaja Bahadur Sır Ravaneshwar Prashad Singh K.C.I.E. of Gidhaur, in the district of Monghyr, to His Excellency the Governor-General in Conneil, with a request that the appointment of the Malaraja to a seat on this Honor's Council might be approved. The sanction of His Excellency to this nomination has now been communicated to the Bengal Government, and the appointment will be made in due

I am to request that you will communicate a copy of this letter to the Chairmen of the District Boards in your Division, and also to Mr. Hennessy and to Rai Surji Narayan Singh Bahadur.

GRIEVANCES OF BRITISH INDIAN SUBJECTS RESIDING IN AFRICA.

- There are over 100,000 British Indian subjects residing in South Africa i.e., in Cape Colony, Natel, the South African Republic (Transvas), and the Orange Free State. These may be roughly divided into four main classes as follows:
- be roughly divided

 (1) Merchants.

 (2) Hawkers.

 - (3) Domestic Servan's.
 (4) Labourers, i.e., indentured coolies whose indentures have expired.

In the Transvaal alone there are 200 merchants (with liquidated assets valued at £100,000), about 2,000 hawkers, and 1,500 domes tic servants.

- The Indian traders by their thrifty and simple mode of life have become strong competitors in trade with European settlers. This has aroused jealousy and bad teeling among the other colonists, be treating the Indians in a spirit of persecu tion and vexatious tyranny; and more especially by means of their preponderating voice in the several South African States, to be making a determined effort to lower the status of those British subjects who happen to be natives of British India.

 3. The following are some of the matters in which it is attempt-
- ed to impose restrictions upon British Indians, by the several Governments of Cape Colony, Natal, the South African Republic (Transvaal), and the Orange Free State:---
- The acquisition of Real Property. (1)
- The possession of the Franchise.
 Freedom of locomotion both by day and night.
- The granting of Trade licenses (which are necessary for all engaged in trade).
- Freedom of choice as regards places of residence and places of business.

Early in this year the Cape Assembly passed a Bill authorising the East London Municipality to legislate with a view to compel British Indians to reside in locations and to take out passes should they want to leave their homes after 9 p.m. Generally, an at tempt is being made to treat all Indians, whatever their caste and position, as "coolies," i.e., labourers (generally assisted emigrants whose indentures have expired); and further to class all coolies " with kaffirs and other native races, however uncivi-

Trade jealousy is at the root of this hostile treatment, but other pleas are put forward, namely, that the Indians are un-civilised barbarians, and more particularly that their insanitary mode of life is a standing menace to the health of the community On this latter point, however, the evidence appears to be all the other way. Vide post, para. 9.

The most urgent matter is perhaps the attempt which is being made to compel the Indians to confin: themselves both for purposes of residence and of trade to certain fixed "locations," necessarily inconvenient for trade, as being away from the acnecessarily inconvenient for trade, as being away from the actual town, and possibly dangerous to health, as being in a situation for which no one has any particular use except it may be the deposit of town refuse. Such a case actually occurred in 1893, and elicited a strong protest from the British Agent against the action of the Transvaal Government. Vide Green Book No. 11. of 1893.] Such an unreasonable restriction on liberty can at the best mean nothing less than financial ruin to a merchant.

6. What appears to have taken place in the Pranswall is the.
The Convention of Pretoria, 1881, clause 14, and the Convention of London, 1884, between the South African Republic and Great Britain, alike provide that equal treatment in the eye of the law shall be received by all persons residing in the Republic save and except natives of the place. These conventions did not confer any status on the fuding or any other British subjects. They merely safeguarded that "footing of equality with all Her Majesty's other subjects" upon which successive Secretaries of State for the Colonies have desired that the Queen's Indian subjects should be treated.

Cause 14 of the Convention was amended by law 3 of 1885 in the direction of allowing British In lian subjects to be required to reside and trade in separate "locations." But to this Law Her Majesty's Government refused assent, stating most emphatically in the course of the correspondence on the subject that separate streets might be set apart for the Indians in the interests of the public health, but that they could not be compelled to trade in certain fixed parts only of the towns.

8. In 1886 an amended form of liw 3 of 1885 was passed, and the then High Commissioner, Sir H. Robinson, in withdrawing his opposition thereto made it clear that even in its amended form this departure from the Convention was only permitted on what this acparture from the Convention was only permitted on what had been represented to him as urgent sanitary grounds. In his letter dated 26th September, 1886, at p. 46 of Green Book No. I of 1894, he says, "Although the amended law is still a contravention of the 14th Article of London, I shall not advise Her Majesty's Government to offer further opposition to it in view of your Honour's opinion that it is necessary for the protection of the public health." It is to be regretted that Sir H. Robinson did not take steps to ascertain for himself whether or not the state of things in existence at the time justified the opinion of the Head of the Republic as expressed to him.

o The assumption that any sanitary necessity exists for this curtailment of the liberties of British Indian subjects appears to be singularly ill-founded. The following three certificates from European doctors resident in Pretoria and Juhannesburg speak for

"I hereby certify that I have practised as a general medical practitioner in the town of Pretoria for the last five years.

During that period I have had a considerable practice amongst the Indians, especially about three years ago, when they were more numerous than at present.

I have generally found them cleanly in their persons, and free from the personal diseases due to dirt or careless habits. dwellings are generally clean, and sanitation is willingly attended to by them. Class considered, I should be of opinion that the lowest class Indian compares most favourably with the lowest class white, i.e., the lowest class Indian lives better and in better habitation, and with more regard to sanitary measures, than the lowest class white.

have, further, found that during the period that small-pox was epidemic in the town and district, and is still epidemic in the district, that although every nation nearly had one or more of 115 members at sometime in the lazaretto, there was not a single li dian attacked.

Generally, in my opinion, it is impossible to object to the Indian on sanitary grounds, provided always, the inspection of the sani-tary anthorities is made as strictly and regularly for the Indian as for the white.

H. PRIOR VEALE, B.A., M.B., B.C. Cantab.

27th April, 1895. Pretoria, Z. A. R.

JOHANNESBURG, 1895.

This is to certify that I have examined the residences of the bearers of this note, and that they are in a sanitary and hygienic condition, and in fact such as any European might inhabit. I have resided in India, I can certify that their habitations here in the Z.A.R. are far superior to those of their native country.

C. P. Spink, M.R.C.S. & L.R.C.P. (London).

Having frequently occasion to visit the better class of the Indian population of Johannesburg (merchants, etc., coming from Bomboy) in my professional quality, I give as my opinion, that they are as clean in their habits and domestic life as white people of the same standing.

Dr. NAHMMACHER, M.D., etc.

IOHANNESBURG. 14th March, 1895."

Here, however, the matter was not allowed to rest. Difficulties again arose on the subject of the British Indian subjects and further correspondence took place between the British Government and the Republic, the result of which was that sometime ago the differences between the two Governments were referred to the arbitration of the Chief Justice of the Orange Free State to whom power was given " to decide either in favour of the claims put forward by Her Majesty's Government or by the South African Republic, or to lay down such interpretation of the ordinances, read together with the despatches referring to the question, as shall appear to him to be correct."

11. The Chief Justice has made his award, but if the text of it as given in a petition to the Secretary of State for the Colonics the British Indian subjects residing in the South African Republic is correct then certainly he has not decided the principal question referred to him. He was required to lay down such intertpretation of the ordinances as should appear to bim to be correct. He has not done so, he refers to law 3 of 1885, and its amendment in 1886, and says that the Republic is bound and entitled to give full force and effect to this law subject in case of objections sole and exclusive interpretation in the ordinary course of the tribunals of the country." The law and the tribunals of the country were in existence before the reference to the arbitrator, and both the disputants were well aware of the fact. What they wanted was the Chief Justice's interpretation of the law read with the despatches, and not the interpretation of the law by the tribunals of the country, He has not given it to them, and there can be no doubt but that the award, apart altogether from its unsatisfactory character, is not binding on either party, and the controversy remains where it was when the reference was made to the Chief Justice.

12 So far the British Government would seem to have acted in the interests of their Indian subjects, but hitherto their action has not borne fruit, and the grievances remain unredressed. The first step towards this end is the repeal of the unconstitutional amendments to clause 14 of the Convention of London.

13. From information which has come to this country it is clear that an attempt is being made to disfranchise British Indian subjects throughout South Africa by means of new legislation imsubjects throughout Sonth Arrica by means or new registation imposing conditions which are a practical bar to Indians retaining or obtaining the Franchise. As regards Cape Colony, it appears that an Act, namely, Act 9 of 1892, was passed by the Colonial Parliament, and promulgated on August 16th, 1892. The Indians objected to it as being in effect a disfranchisement Act so far as they were concerned, and they petitioned the Crown to withhold its assent from it; the reasons on which the petition is based are contained in a letter sent by the Indians to the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated October 24th, 1892. As regards Natalalso, a disfranchising Act was passed in 1894. The Indians protested and, failing in the Colony, sent a petition to the Secretary of State for the Colonies praying that the Act might be disallowed by Her Majesty. There is reason to believe that this petition has not yet been disposed of by the Colonial Office.

14. The matters above dealt with are of extreme gravity.
They touch directly the well-being of British Indian subjects in South Africa, and indirectly the rights and privileges of such sub-jects emigrating to other parts of Her Majesty's dominions. It is hoped that they will receive carness and sympathetic consideration on the part of the authorities at home, and such steps taken as will ensure to the British Indian subject the privileges which he enjoyed before the measures complained of were taken in hand.

SIZE AND STRENGTH NO DEFENCE.

SIZE AND STRENGTH NO DEFENCE.

HERE'S a point for you to think over: Size and deve epiment have nothing to do with health. A man may stand six feet two inches in his stockings and have the muscles of a prize fighter, and yet be an essentially inhealthy man. His frail-looking wife may be really the better of the couple; she may easily do more work, endure more expessore, bear more guef and wory, and onthive her big husband. There is a mystery on this than nobody can see into. It is a matter of vitality and organisation—not of dimensions.

Take, for example, the case of Mr. T. B. Staples, of Oakwood, Ont. He is a blacksouth; and I well remember how, when a boy I used to regard a blacksouth with awe and wonder on account of his Stength. It was fearsome to see him swing those mighty harmers and pick up a heavy cartiwheel as though it were a child's hoop. Yet I saw only in part and understood in part.

"Some twelve years ago," writes Mr. Staples, "I became aware that the dreaded disease, dyspepsia, had chosen me for one of its many victims, It is hardly necessary for me to try to describe all the different feelings that came over me. I have talked with many people suffering with dyspepsia, and they have all had about the same experience. Among the symptoms on which we agreed are the following: Bid taste in the mouth; fullness and deadness in the summach after eating; getting no good from one's foul; headache and pilpitation of the heart; gas and sour finds from the stomach dizziness, especially when one rises up suddenly, or bends over his work; loss of appetine; pains in the chest and back, and the weakness that comes from not eating and digesting enough froot to keep the body going. All these things I had; and you can imagine how bad they are for any one; particutally for a man who has get to earn his living by daily hard work, as in ny case.

"After I found out what was the matter with me I consuited a doctor at once, and began to take the medicine he gave me. I am sonly to say it did me little or no good. Althou and everything that was recommended to me in hopes of relief. Yet none of them went to the root of the trouble. Sometimes I would feel a little better and sometimes worse, and that's the way things went on with me yen after year, a dreapy and miserable time. There's no immer could have me to her it over again.

with me yent after year, a dreary and miserable time. There's no immey could hive me to live it over agoin.

"I was still in this condition when a friend, that I had been talking to about myself, advised me to by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrip. I dishif know the merris of the Syrip then, but being auxious to ity anything that might help me, I bought a bottle from Messrs. Hogg Brothers, and commenced taking it. All I can say is, that I found relief immediately, and by continuing with it a short time, all my bad symptoms aboated one by one, and I found myself completely rid of the dyspepsia. Since then I have never had a touch of the old complaint. If there is any other medicine in the world that is able to cure indigestion and dyspepsia as Mother Seigel's Syrip does it, why I have never heard of it. I have recommended the Syrip to other sufferers, and they have been more than pleased with it; and I write these hasty lines in hope the publication of them may come in the nick of time to be nicful to inhers still. Yours very timly (Singned) Thos. B. Staples Oakwood, Outario, February 25th, 1895."

We need add but few words to Mr. Staples' melligent and manly letter. The disease which afflicined him attacks both texes, all age, and all classes and conditions of humanity. Neither youth not strength is proof against it. It initiates inter complaints, and so leads to faid mistakes in treatment. If you are wise you will acquaint yourself with its character, as described in Mother Seigel's almanack, and know what to do in time of need.

WHOLE NO. 694.

I watched her, almost day by day, And when, by chance, the passing breeze, That woke the leaves, upon the trees, A moment, tossed her veil away, I saw her face, so beauteous fair The tresses of her raven hair ; L saw her large black eye ! A something in it seemed to say, Not, that I should not vainly sigh ; But that she felt compassionate, And took an interest, in my fate ; I grew more bold ; I tried to speak, But could not, I had grown so weak; I know not how, I breathed my pain, And found.-I was beloved again ! Perhaps, I may not tell it right, But this believe, not deem it light, More was the fault, howe'er it seem. For she was pure, as Ganges' stream Ere it hath burst, from the Gowinookh,* And, of the earth, a stain partook.

XI.

We met in secret, night by night, And ye may fancy the delight. I felt, to be with her alone, Wuhont an eye, to mark or tell, The what it had, or had not known, The how, or where, that it befell, Such joy was mine, by the Moon's light, And in these lands, they have such moons, So clear, so beautiful, and bright, They look, like sisters of their suns ; If this were joy, oh I fancy then, The rapture, which I felt, and feel, When, I recall that dream again, Which time; or change can ne'er anneal; When first, I clasped her to my breast, When first, her lip to mine was prest;

I questioned not, nor sought to speak, I felt the burning of her cheek ; As on my neck, her head she hung, As her heart's throb replied to mine, While round her form, my arms were flung,
And hers, around my neck, did twine : Once, such things were ; but they are past, How could those maddening moments last; But graven deep, in meicy's sake, Their memory, in my heart, is traced, And now, the mirror first must break, Before that image be effaced.

A joy, indeed, well, worthy heaven, Is the first kissen the taus, given; Life hath nough to the triangle of triangle of triangle o No rapture, that the heart can know, And yet, it leaves no sting behind ; Compared to ecstacy like this. How, more than poor, is vulgar bliss : But there is that, within the heart, And there, we seem to be accurst, That preys, and gnaws, nor will depart, Till it liath known the best, or worst ; And in our passion, and our pride, When she, we love, is by our side, We little reck what may betide. In such an hour ; the' thou mayst smile, And deem, that I could ne'er beguile, I sat with her, beneath a light, That seemed to chide the gloom of night. Shedding its beams, in silvery shower, That, o'er the heart, had secret power, And the unskilled, with hope to please, I sang to her such notes, as these.

Ah! sure this hour, was made for love; While other hours are but to live; You glorious orb, that rolls above, She knows our hearts, and will forgive.

From bough to bough, with devious flight, You insect sparkles, as it flies ; What is its fitting, fitful, light, To that, which speaks, in thy black eyes?

^{} The Gowmookh is a rocky cleft or gorge, through which the Gauges bursts, from the Himalaya chain of mountains, into the plains. It is called Gowmookh, from a faucied resemblance to the mouth or face of the cow, the most sacred of animals, in the estimation of the ^{}Chandra, the moon, or the goddess who presides over that luminary, is worshipped by the Hindoos. She is represented seated in a two-wheeled car or chanon, drawn by an antelope, while a pennoundicates, that it is against the wind. By this emblem, the Hindoos may be supposed to typify the irresistible nature and fleetingness of time.

The' sweet, the Jasmine's rich perfume, Tho' sweet, the dews, the wild bees sip, The' sweet, the new-blown rose's bloom; What are they, to thy sweeter lip?

As, from the dusky shades of night, You splendent Moon seems doubly fair, Even so, the beauteous face of light Seems fairer, from thy raven hair.

Say! why this sad, tho' witching grace? What sorrow clouds thy lovely breast? Oh! turn to me that angel face, And I will kiss thee, into rest.

Dry up my Love ! the precious tears, That gem those beauteous eyes of thine ; Oh! cease to form these idle fears, Or thou wilt break this heart of mine.

In other lands, these lights will shine, As fleet, this moonlight hour will glide; When I am thine, and thou art mine, Then, what were all the world beside.

But why conceal; each dell, and grove Was witness to our midnight love; And many a lovely spot is there, Down, by th' Atcharbut's sainted shrine ; * Or where Bhormjouin, high in air, Its temple rears, the sacred sign Of our new buth; † the promise given ; Whereby, the twice-born hope for Heaven ; Or, by Ramsillah's wooded hill, ‡ Or, by Ramgyah's lonely tree, Or, where the Fulgo's waters swell. When he holds his yearly jubillee .-

bills, in the immediate vicinity of the town of Gyah. It is surmounted by a Hindon temple, and has altogether a very picturesque and romantic appearance.

Within a few yards of the temple, on the top of the mountain, there is a subteraincours cleft in the tock, and through this, I was given to inderstand, the pilgrims pass, by way of being born again or regenerated, or as it is expressed in Brahminical language, of being twice-born, II would appear that ceremones similar to, or with the same object in view, as the baptism of the Christian faith, were performed prior to the time of our Savioui. In the Hindon scriptural writings the word twice-burn is of common occurrence, and in our own scriptures, we read of persons of the Jewish Futh being baptised unto Moses. John the Baptist likewise baptised, previous to the time of Jesus Christ. The Hindon's endeavoured to unitate the process of being born again, more hierally, and they forced themselves through clefts in tacks, which had become sauctified by time; or they dug subterraneous caves, in the earth or rock, for the same purpose. I have been informed, that a natural cleft, perhaps similar to those above mentioned, exist somewhere in the vicinity of Dumfries in Scotland, and that it still goes by the name of the Maiden's Bower, I believe from its being considered a criterion, in doubtful cases, in which that delicate point is to be describined. Can this be some stray tradition, that has come down to us, straggling through the mist of ages, till it has lost its way? Those, who have not hid the advantage of personal observation, in the Est, itry derive a good deal of information, on this subject, from the penual of Mr. O'Bren's work, on the Round Towers of Ireland.

The Ramsillah is a detached hill, covered with brushwood, and surmounted by one or more Hindon temples. It it situated, on the left bank of the Fulgo, immediately below the town of Gyah, and is held in great religious veneration by the Hindons.

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deafness, Suiging in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free, -- Artificial Eur-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VITORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

That time is now ;-the rains from Heaven, Descend :-- his waters proudly flow. With force, and speed, like arrow driven, By manhood's strength, from bended bow. Thou see'st you small, and rocky isle, Near the Ramsillah's base, So fresh, and green, it seems to smile. As, in mid-stream, it lays ; Aye I once indeed, it might have smiled, It held my Lilloo's home, And still her father calls his child; She comes not,-cannot come ! The moss-grown temple, and the trees, The shrine, at which her parent prays, The hut, in which she dwelt, are there ; But where is she?-oh! where, oh! where?

We met, as we had done before, I rowed her to, and from the shore; Until that fatal night, -that night, When moon, and stars withheld their light, That night of darkness,-dark indeed, Ave. dark even, as the grave, That night, I saw my Lilloo bleed, And saw .- and could not save.

Twas midnight, and the stream its course, Pursued with more, than wonted force. Builing in eddies, here and there, That downward sucked the drafting wrack, And shricking, as if fiends of air, To aid its will, were at its back ; Twas then, my skiff approached the land, Behind a rock, her father stood ! Just as it grated, on the strand, He hurled her, in the roaring flood. " Naw go," said he, "and take thy fill, " Aye go, and stroll with her, at will; " For impious love, the fittest bed " Is secret dwelling, with the dead, " What craven ! I had thought thee brave, " And fear'st thou then, to share her grave?" I heard no more; I plunged in, I followed, and I searched in vain ; Yet once, I saw a speck of white, Or thought so, by that feeble light, And once, oh God ! I heard my name, But, in such accents of despair, As tenderness were mixed with blame, They still are ringing, in my ear ; Not not to save, from years of pain, Would I those wild shrieks hear again.

XVII

Worn, and unfit to struggle more, 'Tis all I know, I reached the share, I followed, by the river's side ; With Lilloo's name, I rent the air ; I listened, but no voice replied, An echo mocked, at my despair. I heard the Jackal's piercing cry, DEAFNESS COMPLETELY CURED! Any person suffering from Deafness, Noises in the Head, &c., may learn of a new, simple treatment, which is proving very successful in completely curing cases of all kinds. Full particulars, including many unsolicited testinomials and newspaper press notices, will be sent post free on application. The system is, without doubt, the most successful ever brought before the public. Address, Annal Specialist, Albany Buildings, 39, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S. W.

Twas plaintive, as my own, and yet* I hated it, I scarce knew why ; I thought of what might be her fate. And shuddered, and his lust of gore Seemed then, more hideous, than before ! "We have received a copy of "An Indian Journalist," being the Life, Letters and Correspondence of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Miokeijee, late Editor of Ress and Raspet, Calcutts, by F. H. Skrine, I. C. S. Calcutta: Thacket, Spink and Co., 1895. The volume covers about 500 pages, crawn octavo, and is deeply interesting from start in finis, as we can say from a few havy glances we have had through its pages. Sambhu Chunder Mankeijee was, as we have often sand, a man in a million, a prince among journalists, a nobleman to the backhone. His life and letters should therefore be read with care and thowards such as we have not ver had time to give. But we backhone. His life and letters should therefore be read with care and thought, such as we have not yet had time to give. But we hope to publish a detailed review of the wark as soon as we have stone so. The mame of Mr. Skitne is a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of the body of the volume before in, while the letters and correspondence of Dr. Mnokejee, some of which we have read, are of rare interest and value, not to say highly instructive. As the proceeds of the sale of the book will go to the late Doctol's founly, we would recommend to all educated men, European and Native, to buy the book and read it. Mr. Skrine deserves the thanks of all India for his labour of love and nothing will show that thad-thickess except a practical and substantial demonstration. The book is naived Six Rugges, and is throughly worth that sum." is priced Six Rupees and is thoroughly worth that sum."

To make the book purchasable by many, the cash price has been fixed at Rs. 5, pustages &c., 4 annus, per V P. P., Rs. 5 6. Rs. 6 ts the credit price.

It is related of Raja Rajkushna of Satanati that, ravished by the music of a suggeter, he kissed hun, mistaking him for a songstress. The Rija had refused at first to give him audience, because he excelled in lighter airs and sang tuppa which came most fittingly and sweetly from woman's lips. THE delightful Eden of modern times is surely Loimaw, one of the smallest of the Southern Snan States "The soil is good and it is well watered; and the population is as thick on the ground as the land will carry, and they appear very flourishing. The old Newegunhmu is the father of eight grown-up children, and may be described as the father of his people as well. The population is entirely agricultural, and crime is unknown. A happy and contented family party, who are not overassessed but bear their falr burden towards the general tribute with the rest of the States." Such is the description of the place by Mr. Hildebrand. Is the Superintendent of the Shan States any descendant of the Nestor of German romance?

HERE is a process of renovating old trees, recommended by a gardener who for many years largely supplied the London market with fruit.

gauener who for many years largely supplied the London market with fruit.

"It is generally found that after an apple-tree has borne for a certain number of years, it becomes comparatively unpinductive. It has been usual to such cases to remove the old tree, and replace it by a younger one. This may be obviated by refigrafting the old tree; and according to the testimony of the gardener, the older the stock, the better is the quality of the fruit. He had scarcely a tree of any age, among several hundreds that his orchard contained, when the writer visited it, that had not undergone this process, and in some cases more than once. There were trees whose trunks were so hollow as in some parts to be little more than a shell, which had been subjected to this operation the season before, and, judging from the vigorous appearance of the grafts, with perfect success. The plan he adopted was the following:—The ends of the branches were sawn or cut off where they were about the size of a man's wrist, or rather less, and two or more scious inserted in each, according togeticumstances. By this means, in the course of thise years he obtained a large, full-bearing tree. The principal difficulty was to protect the new grafts from damage in high winds. This was overcome by ingrafting the half of the tree at one time, and leaving the other to form a shelter; and completing the interhalf when the grafts were sufficiently grown to return the shelter. It is scarcely necessary to add, that this precaution did not supersed the usual appliances for giving the scious support, by means of poles attached to the branches. It may also be remarked, that the productive powers of apple-trees are frequently imparted by the want of sufficient attention in gathering the fruit. The greatest care should be observed in removing the apple, that the bearing spir be not broken or immed thereby."

IN Australia they have a simple and rapid method of converting the whole carcass of an animal into tallow. It is called "builing down" and thus described in Bush Life in Australia :

down" and thus described in Buth Life in Australia:

"The whole carcass, having been cut to pieces, and thrown into large cart-fron pains, each capable in containing several billocks, is builed to tags, during which operation the fat is skimmed off, until no nime rises to the sucface. The builed meet is then taken into for the pains, and after having been squeezed in a wooden press, which forces out the remaining particles of tailow, it is either thrown away or used as food for pigs, was mumbers of which are sometimes kept in this manner in the neighbourhood of a builing establishment. The proprietor of these places will either bond down the settler's sheep and cattle at so much per head, or picchase them wholly from loin in the first instance, and convert them mix tallow at their own risk. The value of an animal for this purpose depends of course entirely on his condition, and usually varies from 30. in 37, 10s."

In Calcutt, all sorts of dead and decomposed animals are "builed."

In Calcutta, all sorts of dead and decomposed animals are "builed down " for ghes of the ordinary market, which is repugoant to both the Hindu and the Mahomedan. We are not sure that prosecutious for sale of adulterated articles of fond have been able to stop this nauseous manufacture.

The Police is generally accused of high-handedness. But here is an instance of meckness and helplessness. The Zemindars are now-a-days not disposed to part with their immey in aid of a project which has not the support of very high authority and gives no prospect of distinction. Nor is it possible for every one of them to so easily comply with a request of the kind as the District Superintendent wishes. Oftentines they are Zemindars in name only. A mere reply, again, unaccompanied by a cheque, will not satisfy the Superintendent.

THE Statesman of Tuesday reproduces from Harper's Magazine an account of the execution of John Palm, a book-seller of Noremberg, under the orders of Napoleon. The man was perfectly innocent and the story of his unhappy fate became widely known over not only the continent but the British Isles as well. To adopt the words of the writer in the Magazine, "it kindled into patriotic fire the smouldering embers of German nationality." In England, it created almost no impression, although the English press was ever on the watch for giving the widest publicity to incidents furnishing evidence of the cruel disposition of the French Emperor and his utter disregard of considerations of justice. In the literary circles of London the execution of poor Palm was treated with a sort of heartlessness that is painful to contemplate. Wits seized it as even reflecting credit on Napoleon and proving his sympathy with authors. The poet of Hope in particular, he who wept so nobly for fillen Sarmatia and for the dusky millions that were oppressed by the rising British Power in India, himself laughed over this heart-rending execution and caused others to laugh over it. Read the following from Curwen's History of Book-sellers, the old and the new. " Pour Compbell had suffered much from the publishers. His 'Pleasures of Hope' had been resected by every book-seller in Glasgow and Eduburgh ; not one of thein would even risk paper and printing upon the chance of its success. At last, Messrs. Mundell and Son, printers to the University of Glasgow, with much reincrance undertunk the publication, upon the liberal condition of allowing the author fifty copies at trade price, and, in the event of its reaching a second edition, a gratuity of ten nounds. A few years afterwards, when Campbell was present at a literary dinner party, he was asked to give a toasi, and without a moment's hesitation he proposed 'Bonaparte,' Glasses were put down untouched, and shours of 'The Ogiel' resounded. 'Yes, gentlemen, said Campbell gravely, there is to Bounparte; he has just shot a bookseller I' Amid shouts of applause, for the dioner was to 'Bokemia,' the glasses were jaugled and the toast was drunk, for the news had but just arrived that Palm, a book-seller of Nucemberg, had been shot by the Emperor's orders." Let us hope Campbell did not know the details of the case.

Here is the nariative from Harper's -

"In the summer of 1806, the year of Jena, there lived in the picturesque old town of Noremberg a much respected bookseller named John Palm. He received, one dry, in the usual course of business, a package of books consigned through him to other booksellers of his neighbourhood; these books were done up in separate packages, addressed to the respective consignees, and John Palm had no other connection with them bear reforming for their safe delivery.

One copy was consigned in a bookseller in Augsbing, who allowed bis children to read it; through them, however, it fell into the hands of some French officers who were quartered upon the paster of a neighbouring village, and thus it became known to the higher French authorities. On the 7th of July, 1806, Napoleon ordered John Palm to be tried by court-martial and shot.

This respectable booksteller was so convinced of his own innocence and had such complete proof that he was not the author nor the publisher of the book, and did not even know what the book was about that he refused the abundant opportunities he had of avoiding arrest by escaping into Austria or Prinsia.

On the 22nd of August he was locked up in the fortress of Braunau, an Austrian town, garrisoned by Freich troops, about 200 miles from Nuremberg. He had taken leave of his wife and children, promising a speedy return, and felt confident that his trial would be merely a matter of form, and so it was.

He was given two short bearings. No one was allowed to plead for him, and within two days of entering the fortress he was sentenced to be shot.

At 11 o'clock on the 26th of August he was notified that he was to be shot at 2 o'clock, leaving him barely tone to write a few letters to his family and most intimate friends.

The good people of the town begged mercy for him at the knees of the French commandant, ignorant of the fact that this officer was acting not as judge, but as executioner.

At the appointed hour John Palm was placed upon a peasant's cart, and escouted beyond the walls of the fown under a strong military escort. His wrists were tied behind his back, and six Fiench soldiers srepped forward, amied, and fired. Five of the shots missed him; the sixth brought him to the ground with a cry of pain. He struggled to his feet to receive another volley, which again brought him to the ground, placed the muzzles of their muskets against his head, and finished the task with disgusting thoroughness.

JURY TRIAL IN INDIA.

In noticing, two years ago, the now famous lecture, at the Chaitanya Library, of Sir Alexander Miller on the origin of trial by Jury, we had ventured to say that it was evidently a feeler put forth for guaging the measure of veneration cherished by the people of this country for jury trial. Without following Sir Alexander into the devious paths of the early legal history of England, we did not hesitate to point out that the Law Member of the Viceregal Council had committed some grave blunders in his account of the celebrated case of the Seven Bishops. In the first place, he had spoken of the accused as having admitted publication. As a matter of fact, however, publication had been denied, and the Crown had the greatest difficulty in proving it and could not prove it without violating the royal pledge. Then, the collective nature of the petition had nothing to do with the criminality charged against the Bishops, although Sir Alexander seemed to think that the fact of their having signed the document together had formed one of the elements of the offence. He even went so far as to suggest an analogy between the charge against the Bishops and the rule which is in force in India against collective petitions by Government servants. He had, again, named Hallam and Macaulay as his authorities for the version he gave of the secrets of the jury room, although, as we pointed out, the learned historian of the British constitution has not, in any of his works, devoted a single sentence to the details of that case, very properly referring his readers to general histories of England, an I although Macaulay's account is totally different from the lecturer's. We openly doubted whether Sir Alexander had really read Macaulay, for it was impossible to believe that anybody, after having perused, even once, the brilliant and highly picturesque narrative of Macaulay could so far forget the verdict of "not guilty" to the butcher's pertinacity when, as a matter of fact, it was the brewer,-or the butcher if Sir Alexander would have it so,—that had displayed the dogged determination of convicting notwithstanding the wish of all his colleagues to acquit. Such a derangement of epitaphs was scarcely possible for a scholar and jurist like the Law Member to indulge in, especially while delivering a public lecture at a native Institute, with the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court presiding. Sir Alexander Miller had the candour to explain, in a letter he addressed, not to us but to another journal, that he had not read Macaulay "for the last forty years." Indeed, he cried "peccavi " and admitted some of his blunders, passing over others in silence. He sought, however, to qualify his admissions and minimise the gravity of the blunders by the remark that they in no way affected his general argument. We did not think it fit to join issue with him on this, content with his admission that "trial by jury, as it exists in India, is less detrimental to the due administration of justice than it is in the United Kingdom." The learned Law Member denied the correctness of our surmise that his lecture had been "intended as a manifesto sent forth to cover the Elliottic blunder and to prepare the way for a similar change in Bombay and Madras." To every word of this, he gave " the most emphatic contradiction that the laws of politeness admitted." Unfortunately for us, we were not prepared for the acceptance of this emphatic disclaimer. We did not doubt the veracity of Sir Alexander Miller in the least. The situation, however, was such that even if Sir Alexander did not act from any such intention, he fairly laid himself open to the charge. The whole country was in a ferment about Sir Charles Elliott's blundering notification. It was being denounced from both the platform and the press in every quarter. The cultured section of the European community in India sympathised with the natives in their alarm and anxiety. At such a juncture of affairs, the Law Member of the Supreme Legislative Council of India thought it fit to deliver a discourse, under the presidency of the Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court, in which, among other things, he laboured to establish the points that, after all, trial by jury was not a very ancient institution, that it did not come from the free air and the forests of Germany, that "the idea, now so deeply rooted in many minds, that there is some natural connection between trial by jury and British liberty, is negatived by antecedent history, that it was really an institution of which the English people could not very well be proud, and, lastly, that there was a ridiculous incident connected with the history of its turning point inasmuch as it was a burly butcher whose obstinacy alone could be said to have saved English liberty. The whole country, with a unity of voice that was remarkable, was arguing for establishing the importance of trial by jury, for showing the dangers to which the community would be exposed if such trial were withdrawn, and for pointing out that there was a peculiar cruelty in taking away the privilege after having generously accorded it to the people and that at a time when no evidence was forthcoming to prove that the privilege had in any way been abused in the enjoyment. They were fortifying their assertions by citing the opiit as to actually confound, after the manner of Sir nions of such among the judicial officers of the realm Alexander Miller, king James' brewer with as had chosen to express themselves on the question the butcher of his own conjuring and ascribe at the time of the previous amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure. There was a peculiar unfitness in the selection of that time by the very head of the legislative machinery of the empire for telling the people that it was, after all, a mere toy upon whose acquisition they had set their hearts. Sir Alexander Miller might have discussed the question as one of mere speculative interest. Indeed, after his emphatic asseveration that it was even so, no one that was not absolutely a boor could possibly refuse to accord him the fullest credit. Sir Alexander Miller, however, it cannot be denied, showed an absolute want of judgment in delivering even a speculative discourse on what was the burning question of the hour. Our surmise was one of the direct consequences of that absence of judgment on his part. The time, the subject, the manuer of treating it, were all against the supposition that the Law Member of the Government of India intended to offer the public only an academic thesis without the slightest possibility of any of his conclusions being practically adopted for the amendment of the existing

The Bill introduced by Sir Alexander Miller into the Supreme Council for amending the provisions, in the Code of Criminal Procedure, on trial by jury, contains views which were first set forth by Sir Alexander Miller in the speculative lecture to which we have referred. While admitting, without the slightest reservation, that Indian juries are less detrimental to the due administration of justice than juries in the United Kingdom, the present effort of Sir Alexander Miller seems to be rather Quixotic. As the head of the legislative machinery of this extensive empire, Sir Alexander is evidently ambitious of improving juries to an extent not yet reached in the British Isles. Half the evils of India are traceable to this ambition of Indian officials to achieve something in their res pective departments that has not been achieved as yet in their mother country. The mechanism of administration in the United Kingdom is such that no man there is able to tamper with any institution by seeking to reduce his own fads into practice. In India the case is different. This is the land of experiments, the country where bricks are attempted to be made without straw and sun beams sought to be extracted from cucumbers, and where officials make themselves miserable in view of ills as remote and imaginary as those that moved the men of science of Laputa. The Law Member has sketched his progamme for enhancing the usefulness of juries. But the main question has not yet been answered to the satistaction of the public, however satisfactorily Sir Alexander Miller may have answered it to himself, the question, viz., whether that plan will not really inprove juries off this dependency of the British Crown? The Law Member seems to imagine that juries should not have the power of bringing in general verdicts in criminal trials. It is the old, old controversy that raged in England for many years till it was settled by Fox's Libel Act of 1792. Those who are acquainted with the history of that controversy know that while servile judges and courtly lawyers held the view that in prosecutions for libel the function of the jury was simply to find the fact or otherwise of publication including the filling in of innuendos, the question of libel or no libel being determinable by the judges alone, 'others of great name in our jurisprudence," to quote the words of the historian of the British Constitution, "and the majority of the public at large, conceiving that this would throw the liberty of the press altogether into the hands of the judges, maintained that the jury had a strict right to take the whole matter into their consideration, and determine the defendant's criminality or innocence according to the nature and circumstances of the publication." How the doctrine, at once servile and inimical to the liberty of the press, had to be given up notwithstanding its support by Lord Mansfield and Thurlow, is wellknown to the student of legal history. Lord Campden, a name more glorious than that of Lord Mansheld, who was the author of the Bill introduced by Fox, vigorously knocked it on the head. Soon after Lord Mansfield's charge to the jury, affirming this opinion in the case of Rex. v. Woodfall which arose upon the publication of Junius's Letter to the King, Serjeant Glyun and others exposed its mischievous consequences in the powerful speeches they made in the Lower House of Parliament. Sir Alexander Miller's project is nothing less than to deprive, in effect, Indian juries of the power of returning general verdicts not only in cases of libel but in other cases as well that are, under the Indian law -which really means the will of the Executive Government for the time being as expressed by notifications in the Gazette,-triable by juries. Among the amendments proposed by Sir Alexander Miller the most important one is contained in Section 3 of the Bill, by which power is given to the judges to dispense altogether with general verdicts and require juries to return what are called special verdicts on particular questions of fact which the judges shall present to them. Can there be a doubt that, armed with such powers, judges, when they choose to differ from the jury as regards the criminality of the accused, will always insist upon the return of special verdicts? The fact is, Sir Alexander Miller's ideas regarding the utility of juries in criminal trials are unquestionably different from those generally entertained by the soundest of jurists, British or Continental. That the Home Member of Lord Lansdowne's Government, who was only an Indian Civilian, should misunderstand the true functions of the jury and class it with those institutions that exist under all Governments for the repression of crime, was no wonder. Indian Civilians, with rare exceptions, are not noted for their proficiency in law or legal history. Mr. Hutchins, in particular, was not known to have made criminal jurisprudence a special study. It is one thing, however, to find an ordinary Indian Civilian misconceiving the true functions of the jury in criminal trials, and quite another to see a lawyer and jurist of Sir Alexander Miller's reputation commit the same blunder. The fact is, in most civilised countries, after the commission of a crime and a preliminary investigation by the Police ending in an accusation against a particular individual, the real task that the Crown undertakes, when it puts the accused person before a Court of justice, is not simply to shew the existence of facts inconsistent with the supposition of his innocence but to satisfy a definite number of men endued with ordinary intelligence that the prisoner standing before them has actually committed the offence charged against him. It is one thing to think a man guilty and another to prove him so legally. Juries do not exist for repressing crimes. Their function, on the other hand, is to ments and very prejudices, and mingling with the mass of the people after its temporary duty is discharged, the jury not unoften stands between the Crown and the people in state prosecutions where the object is to break a publicist or politician obnoxious to the administration for the time being. Whether arising out of the provisions in dog Latin of the Magna Carta, or owning an origin traceable to the free air and the forests of Germany, no better safeguard could the ingenuity of man devise against the oppression of power. Obvious as these considerations are, they are frequently ignored in India. They were ignored on the last occasion by the Home Member of the Government of India, On the present occasion they are ignored by the learned Law Member.

Under the existing law, the verdict of the jury in India is not final. The trying judge, when he sees teason to differ from the jury, is at liberty to refer the case to a higher tribunal. That tribunal, again, has the power of taking up the case as one in appeal. It is not hampered, in even the slightest degree, by the verdict of the jury, from going behind it and weighing quite independently the evidence for and against in its own scale. These are sufficient safeguards against any miscarriage of justice. So great is the respect paid to the verdict of the jury in the United Kingdom that there judges are bound to accept it however perverse. No machinery exists for correcting those perverse verdicts. In India, it seems, that those responsible for her laws are not satisfied with even the existing safeguards. They must proceed further. They are for effecting the impossible, viz., the absolute prevention of miscarriage of justice in every case. In seeking to effect that object, they do not mind how they degrade the jury.

An obvious effect of the proposed amendments will be the reluctance of men, with ideas of self-respect, to serve on the jury. One serving on a jury has the right to know as to whether he is trusted or not. There ought to be but one answer to his query. Either trust him completely or dismiss him to attend to his own affairs. A certain series of facts constitute the offence of theft. The removal, with dishonest intention, of movable property belonging to another, is the essence of the offence. a jury can be trusted with finding the facts of removal and intention, there is no earthly reason why it should not be trusted with the power of saying whether those facts do, in its estimation, actually amount to the commission of the offence stated. The analogy, drawn from the functions of the jury in civil cases in the United Kingdom, does not at all apply to its functions in criminal trials. The laws of property and personal status are often very intricate. Take, for example, the simplest cases, vis, those arising out of the law of Limitation. A jury may be asked to find as to whether the plaintiff has or has not resided for 12 years in the house claimed by him. Supposing the finding is the negative, the inference does not follow that the plaintiff's rights have been barred. Possession in law is a highly complicated question. One may be in legal possession of one's house, although not residing in it for the statutory period. The fact, again, of one's having gone through a ceremony of marriage with another may be proved or found, yet the legality of the marriage may not follow from be declared legal or otherwise. Then, in civil causes, the same facts are very often relied upon by both the plaintiff and the defendant, and inferences diametrically opposed to each other, are often drawn from them. Under such circumstances, juries cannot very well be asked to return general verdicts for this or that side. They should return only special verdicts affirming the existence of certain facts. How often are those special verdicts relied upon by both sides as favouring their view of the law cannot be unknown to a lawyer of Sir Alexander Miller's reputation.

It is difficult to remove the impression, that has become rather general, that the trial of criminal offences by jury in India is an eye-sore to officials of a certain class. The constant endeavours to tamper with the institution are responsible for that impression. How often we hear people say that, unable to repeal it openly, all sorts of insidious attempts are made to take away the substance and leave only the shadow!

INDIA AND CHITRAL. THE TALE OF THE BLUE-BOOK.

In a despatch from the Government of India to the Secretary of State, dated June 11, 1877, it is related how the Mehtar of Chitral tendered allegiance to the Maharaja of Kashmir, and how the representatives of Chitral and Yassin formally confirmed that tender at the Delhi assembly. The Khan of Dir wished at the same time to become tributary to Kashmir, but he afterwards proposed obedience to the Amir of Kabul. The Mehtar communicated this fact to the Maharaja, and said all the neighbouring Chiefs were submitting to the Amir, and that he himself was left too isolated and too weak to resist without assistance the pressure which he expected from a Kabul agent then on his way to Chitral.

RESISTING KABUL.

The despatch says: In reply His Excellency in Council authorized the Maharaja to instruct the Chitral Chief to resist the claims of Kabul and to furnish him with the means of doing so, relying, if necessary upon the support of the British Government. At the same time, under the instruction of His Excellency in Council, a letter was addressed by the Commissioner of Peshawar to the Amir at Kabul, warning him against any endeavour to assume sovereignty over Bajour, Swat, Dir or Chitral, and reminding His Highness that as the British Government had never recognized his claim to allegiance from those States, to enforce it without the assent of that Government would be regarded as an unfriendly act. In a despatch dated February 28, 1879, the Government of India said: Our object is to acquire through the ruler of Kashmir the power of making such political and military arrangements as will effectually command the passes of the Hindu Kush. With this object we shall take every opportunity of strengthening on control over the country lying south of the mountain slopes, and of attaching the Chiefs, through Kashmir, to British interests. It was added that the Chitral engagement with Kashmir would be drawn as close as possible, and the despatch concluded: Although we desire to realize our plans gradually by pacific means, we shall nevertheless consider it from the first incumbent upon the Government of India to prevent at any cost the establishment within this outlying country of the political preponderance of any other Power, nor do we anticipate that any such interference with our legitimate authority will be attempted in earnest so soon as it shall have become known that we have marked out a clear and consistent frontier, and that we intend to maintain it.

DEALING WITH UMRA KHAN.

claimed by him. Supposing the finding is the negative, the inference does not follow that the plaintiff's rights have been barred. Possession in law is a highly complicated question. One may be in legal possession of one's house, although not residing in it for the statutory period. The fact, again, of one's having gone through a ceremony of marriage with another may be proved or found, yet the legality of the marriage may not follow from such finding. The most intricate considerations of law may have to be disposed of before the marriage can said: In regard to Chitral it has been the consistent policy of Government of India to exclude from that country not merely the control but even the influence of the Amir of Afghanistan; but apart from the evils which might result from Chitral falling under Afghan influence or domination, it is obvious that the near prospect of the Russian occupation extending to the north bank of the Punja, which is less than a day's march from the Chitral frontier, renders it a matter of importance to us to be able to control the external affairs of Chitral. I cannot agree that it would be a wise policy to give the Amir sucreainty over that it would be unjustifiable to deprive Kashmir of her acknowledged right of suzerainty over that State in order to hand it over to an Afghan ruler. Lord Kimberley at this period said: It would be premature to decide on the permanent political and military arrangements for that part of the frontier. This view was confirmed in a despatch from the Secretary of State dated August 3rd, 1894.

THE RELIEF OF CHITRAL.

Telegraphic despatches of March, 1895, follow, showing how the 1st division was mobilized to effect the rehef of Dr. Robertson's party in Chitral Fort. The Secretary of State on March 30th wired: As 800n as present trouble is over, policy with regard to Chitral and neighbourhood will have to be fully and carefully reconsidered. Meantime our hands should be kept perfectly free. I hope therefore that you will take care that nothing is said or done to commit Government either way with regard to making new roads or retention of posts now occupied or occupation of new posts. In a long despatch, dated April 77th, the Government of India gave a narrative of the events which led up to the situation at that time.

VIEWS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

On April 18th they wired that they were agreed that a military occupation of Chitral supported by a road to the Peshawar border was a matter of the first importance. If such road was not opened they had not unanimously come to a conclusion in regard to the expediency of occupying Chitral, but they were unanimous in asking the permission to enter into negociations with the tribes with a view to obtaining their consent to the opening up of this road when, in the opinion of the Government, an opportunity should arise in connection with Sir Robert Low's advance. In their opinion it would be a serious mistake to lose that opportunity.

MR. FOWLER'S REPLY.

The Secretary of State in reply pointed out that recent events had shown the peril of maintaining a British officer with an escort in Chitral, so long as he could be only supported via Gilgit. He continued: I wish you to consider and advise me whether the strategical and political importance of Chitral is such, in your opinion, as to render it desirable in the face of these difficulties in the way of the main objects of our past policy in Chitral, which, as I understand, were to control its external affairs in a direction friendly to our interests to secure an effective guardianship over its northern passes, and to watch what goes on beyond them. Also whether you can suggest any method of securing these objects less costly and less hazardous than that lately inforce. In a telegram, dated April 25, the Secretary of State said he had no objection to the tribes being sounded as the terms and conditions on which they would consent to the opening up and maintaining of the Peshwar-Chitral road should this road be the policy of a military occupation of Chitral; or of maintaining a British officer there permanently, with or without the support of this road, until Her Majesty's Government had had an opportunity of fully considering detailed views and arguments.

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE.

The Viceroy telegraphing on the same day, said: Narrative of events indicates complete withdrawal under present circumstances impossible, as it would leave the country to complete anarchy and would render a settlement more difficult. In our opinion we must, leak keep open the road from Peshawar for some time, probably three or four months at least, whatever the ultimate decision may object to any temporary arrangements which the Government of India considered necessary. On May 8th the Government of India sent a despatch, in which they said that two alternatives were placed before them—they must maintain their position in Chirral, or change their policy, and abandon the attempt to keep any effective control over the external affairs of the State. In this despatch they said: It seems to us to be demonstrated that the maintenance of our influence over Chitral is a matter of the first importance; that to abandon Chitral to the possibility of toreign occupation would involve a risk which we ought not to run; that giving the country over the Afghanistan does not guard India, and would increase the difficulty of our frontier relations with the Amir; and that it would be unjustifiable to ignore our pledges to preserve the suzerainty of Kashmir. Events have, however, greatly changed the conditions under which we cannot hope to maintain that influence.

THE CASE OF SHER AFZUL.

Sher Afzul, an aspirant to the Mehtarship, has ostentatiously departed from the policy of his predecessors in not placing himself under British protection and guidance. He came trusting to the strength of a foreign invader, Umra Khan of Jhandol, perhaps to the power which he believed to be at that invader's back, and ventured to dictate his terms to the British Agent, and to offer his friendship as a favour. Together they raised the country against us, attacked our troops, and cut them off in the defiles, where nature lent strength to their attack; entrapped our officers by treachery and deceil, and laid vigorous seige to the last strongholds in the country whether any of our troops maintained themselves. The events which have culminated in the gallant defence of Chitral and the coulty measures taken for relief, both from the north and the south, render it, in our opinion, impossible that we can ever think of maintaining British influence in that country again without the presence of British troops. In concluding this despatch of Government said. We are fully conscious that the course which we recommend may involve the Government in expense which the finances of India can ill afford, and in an increase of responsibilities with the tribes on our north-west frontier which we would fain avoid. It may be possible to lessen these objections. It amicable relations can be established with the tribes, not only would it be easier to retain them for the autonomy which we should desire to conserve, but the cost of this securing the defence of our frontier may be greatly reduced. In any event the interests are so large that it is our plain duty to lay before you the conclusions at which, after full consideration, we have arrived.

MR. FOWLER'S DECISION.

On June 13th the Secretary of State telegraphed: Her Majesty's Government have given most careful consideration to the question of the future policy in regard to Chitral, and to your letter of 8th May. They fully appreciate your point of view and it is with regret they find themselves unable to concur in the opinion of your Government too which in all matters, they attach great weight. They have decided that no military force or European Agent shall be kept at Chitral that Chitral shall not be fortified, and that no road shall be made between Peshawar and Chitral. It will follow that all positions beyond our frontier now held in consequence of recent relief operations should be evacuated as speedily as circumstances allow, but dates and details are left to your discretion. As regards Chitral State, they request that in view of the decision above stated you will telegraph what are the arrangements which you would recommend for the future. Any proposal which you may make will receive most careful attention from Her Majesty's Government.

THE VICEROY'S REGRET.

The Viceroy wired on July 14: We deeply regret, but loyally accept your decision. We are earnestly considering questions placed before us. On June 22nd the Viceroy wired the arrangements proposed for evacuation. Their proposals were to divide Katur from the Kushwakht country, but to maintain the surerain rights of Kashmir over both; to withdraw Shuja-ul-Mulk, as his life would not be safe if he were left behind, and to bring him to India; to invite the Katuri headmen to elect a Mehtar, excluding the candidature of Sher Afzul, on account of the grave suspicions of his complicity in acts of treachery as well as of hostility; to propose to the Kushwachtis to elect a separate man; to withdraw the Assistant British Agent from the Kathre country when Chitral is evacuated and from the Kushwakht country as soon as circumstances permitted; to maintain control of the country cast of the Shandur Pass by Kashmir troops; and to reserve the question of retaining Kashmir troops in Mastuj until a form of administration had been determined for the Kushwakht country. The despatch concluded: It will be necessary to reward the chiefs of the tribes who have befriended us in the advance from Peshawar to Chitral. Sir Robert Low proposes giving the Khan of Dir 50 sniders, some ammunition, Rs. 25,000, and Rs. 10,000 per annum. We propose to approve of the annual allowance being only paid if the Khan cen, without our assistance, maintain his position in Dir. We have asked for a report with regard to other chiefs and Jhandol. These proposals, if sanctioned, will admit of our taking immediate action, and we consider delay in every way most undesirable.

THE QUESTION RE-OPENED.

The next telegram was from the Secretary of State after the change of Government at home. It was dated July 2nd, and ran: Present Government must consider Chitral question. How long can you wait for decision without grave inconvenience? On the following day the estimated expenditure to the end of June beyond the provision in the Budget and of the monthly expenditure were asked for. The Government of India, replying, said the troops could not be withdrawn in any case till September. The estimated expenditure to June 30 was 145 lakhs beyond the Budget provision. The monthly expenditure was 22 1/4 lakhs.

LORD G. HAMILTON ASSENTS TO RETENTION.

On August tat the Secretary of State asked : Assuming satisfacon rugust it the occretary of other sacts. Assuming survivalence tory road arrangements and a good fortified position, what is the minimum strength of the proposed garrison of Chieral? What is the minimum force you would leave at Mustuj supposing Chieral were evacuated? The Viceroy replied that open negotiations with the tribes had been avoided, but the reports received warranted the confident expectation that a peaceful arrangement for the road could be made. A garrison was proposed of the strength which has since been made known. The road was to be held from Chakdara to Drosh by levies, probably 250 from Swat and 500 from Dir. The bridges at Chakdara and Chutiatan were said by General Low to be sufficient, with minor additions, to last seven years. The despatch added : The Commander-in-Chief assures me that this scheme was drawn up to meet all eventualities, including even the necessity of holding the road in force next year while the supplies and reliefs are going up, though he thinks this unlikely. No addition to the Army is asked. As to Mastuj, it was said that the Commander-in-Chief concurred in the objections to garrisoning it if Chitral were evacuated. On August 9th the Secretary of State telegraphed his assent to the proposals made, but said : "Make no permanent arrangement for a cantonment on the Malakand and neighbourhood until fuller details both of cost and numbers can be sent home. Do nothing in any way to infringe the terms of the Proclamation." On August to the Viceroy wired: "We have informed General Low of the decision of Her Majesty's Government, and have authorized the commencement of negotiations with the Swat Khans and the Khan of Dir, assuring them again that all we wish is to open the road, to insist on order being maintained along it, but to leave to the people their independence, and not annex their country.

STATEMENT OF REASONS.

The Blue-book concludes with a despatch from the Secretary of State, dated August 16th, in which the whole position is re-viewed. Referring to the proposals made when Sir Henry Fowler ordered the evacuation, it is remarked that it was clear that the policy of abandonment would not cease with the mere evacuation of the territory of Chitral. One of the main objects of the es-tablishment of the Gilgit Agency was the facilities it would afford in watching over and keeping under control to the Chitral and Mustuj valleys, which lead to the easiest and most important passes over the Hindu Kush. To abandon these objects would be to deprive the Gilgit Agency of its main value, while the cost of its maintenance would he as heavy as before. Gilgit and its Agency would, under these conditions, cease to be worth maintenance, and the whole country would probably lapse into disorder and disturbance.

DELIMITATION AND DANGER.

The delimitation of the frontiers between the Indian empire and neighbouring Governments has of recent years been more accurately defined, and it seems more than probable that if your Government had in these districts by its retirement announced lts mability to discharge its previous functions, other authorities would step in and undertake the duties thus cast off. This was the state affairs which Her Majesty's Government had to consider on taking office, and the serious objections involved in your alternative proposals, illustrating as they do the difficulties inseparable from giving effect to the policy of abandonment, have led Her Majesty's Government again to examine the proposals contained in your relegram of April 18th the letter of May 8th. It seemed to the Government that the policy which has been continuously to the Government that the policy which has been continuously pursued by successive Governments in their relations with Chitral ought not lightly to be abandoned unless its maintenance had become clearly impossible. Your Government had said before that to abandon Chitral was to forego the advantages of that policy, and that no middle course was possible; and it is certain that the alternative course proposed in your telegram of June 2 and and the same of the same those advantages and indeed was would not have sufficed to secure those advantages, and indeed was open to much of the objection which, in your letter of May 8th, you attach to abandonment. Nor did it seem to Her Majesty's Government that recent events had in any way decreased the the necessity for adhering to the above line of policy.

A WATCHPUL POLICY NECESSARY.

If it was neccessary, owing to the situation on the frontier in 1892, to strengthen the Chitral Agency for the express purpose of keeping a closer watch on the Chitral frontier, the neccessity of maintaining that watch is no less obvious at the present day. The recepting a closer water on the Custai frontier, the neccessity of maintaining that water is no less obvious at the present day. The advance of Russia to the line of the Oxus, and that of the Amir to the castern border of Kafristan are not likely to diminish the remsion which has in past years prevailed on this part of the frontier. Moreover Her Majesty's Government attached considerable importance to the argument that our withdrawal at such a moment could scarcely fail to have a demoralizing effect, not only upon the tribes concerned, but throughout the whole frontier, the population of which would ascribe our retirement to inability to maintain the advantage who had gained in the recent military operations. The Secretary of State goes on to say that doubt was operations. The secretary of state goes on to say that doubt was felt as to the possibility of opening up the Peshawar-Chitral road by peaceful means, and maintaining it without an intolerable burden of expenditure being imposed on Indian finances. That doubt had been removed if the officers of the Government of India had rightly estimated the conditions, and with its removal the main obstacle to the acceptance of the unanimous recommendation of May Sth. had been cleared away.

How this canne to poss he tells us in a letter dated from his home in White House Road, Stebbing, near Duimow, August 24, 1892. He had no inherited disease or weakness, so far as he knew and was always strong and well up to April of that year—1888. Then his strength and energy began to leave him. He felt treed, not as from work, but as from power gone out of him through some bodily failure. He sat down to his ineals, but not with his old eagerness and relish. There was a nasty outper-like laste in his mouth, his teeth and tongue were coveied with almos, and his throat clugged with a kind of thick philegm, difficial to "hawk my

The reader will notice that between the date of his taking this medicine and the date of his letter there is an increval of four years. We may, therefore, infer that his cure was real and permanent. The medicine, by the way, was Mother Seigel's Curnive Syrup. It is not likely be will forget its more nor what it did for him. His disease was indigestion and dyspepsia, the deadly enemy of every labouring man or woman under the sun, no matter what they work at or work with—hands, brains, or both.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SUNYASSEE. BY TAMES HUTCHINSON. CANTO FIRST. (Continued from & 459.) XVIII

Oh ! how I longed, for morning's light, . In banish the dark clouds of gight ; I had small thought, if it might wake All nature, fresh delight to take, Bright'ning the mountain tops, and vales Bearing their fragrance, on its gales, Bidding the bird, on wanton wing,. Its sweet, and cheerful carol sing,
The flower unfold its bosom fair.
And the flower and the heart year.

And had no place or home, in mine, I thought but of it, as a thing, That some relief, from doubt, might bring. It came at last ; I gazed around, But not a gleam of solace found; The stream told nothing, and the shore Left all uncertain, as before ,-I struggled on, and sought to cope, With failing strength, and failing hope : With faltering steps, my path pursued; But still, in purpose, unsubdited.

XIX.

At last, the sun set ;--and with him, The ray, that cheered my heart, grew dun ; Just then, I reached a barren place, An almost herbless waste of sand, But strewed instead, with many a trace Of drift, and wrack, along the strand, And farther on, with murky giare, I saw the red flames beat the air, And high, then flickering columns throw, And figures moving, to and fro, Dark, and of more than common height, That seemed to aid, and feed their might-More near-a single tree there giew, Or blighted stood, that high in air, Its leafless branches threw, The raven, and the vniture there,

Sit perched, upon one bough ;

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deafness, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, wil be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VITORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HOLBORN, LONDON.

The hage grane too ; while down below, The jackal, and the wild dbg wait * With watchful eye, and suppliant gait.

XX.

'Twas then, my spirit sank, and fell; Soon, as I saw that fatal fire, That twilight blaze, I knew it well, It was a Hindoo's funeral pyre ; But whose, I was afraid to ask ; For so my heart foreboded woe; At last, I ventured, on the task, And heard, what most I feared to know. They said, the corpse the river bore, And cast it, on that lonely shore, And, that it wore the female form, Youthful, and lovely, even in death, Without a trace of pain or harm, mark, how it had ceased to breathe s. And more that in ite goutle band, It sull held fast a flowery band; Such garland, of the Champuc's flowers, I gave, that night, in our last homs ; † Yet still I tried to hope retain, Vain hope! she came no more again 1

XXI.

They said, that for some silly dream, Or to fulfil some augury, That they had sought the flooded stream, And finding there, a corpse left dry, Without a friend, or kindred ties, They had performed its obsequies. I gazed a moment, on the pile. All I all I was o'er-the flame was low, But still the quivering embers glow; I thought me of the lone, green isle, Then turned away, and went, As to the fountains of the eyes, The heart's own tear drops seemed to rise,

^{*} The huge adjutant bird, (the argeela,) is here alluded to Scenes * The huge adjutant bird, (the argeela,) is here alluded to Scenes like that described in the rest, if not more horrible, are by no means uncommon; indeed, between Calcutta and the month of the Hooghly, they may be daily witnessed. Perhaps a dog and some vultures are disputing over some carcies, human or other, the crows keeping at a respectful distance, or displaying their activity, by synthing a hasty mouthful, while two or three adjutants, already goiged and sated, are perched aloft, on the topmost boughs of the tree adjucent. Some times, a corpse is to be seen rapidly carried along by the stream, while a solitary vulture goes passenger, busily employed, in making a heavy meal, as he sails along.

[†] The Champuc is a sweet smelling flower, held in great estimation by the Hindoos. It is of a veilow color, and the tree, which bears it, grows to a large size, or at any rate to one larger, than that generally attained, by flowering shubs. These garlands the natives of India make by stringing the flowers of plants, generally of one particular plant, on a thread, in the same manner, as we make a necklace or

And still, out-pouring kept. Her ashes, all that now remained, Of her I loved, I gathered there, And mingled them, with spices rare. And with my tears that rained; Then gave them to the passing stream, And I alas I have mourned her weil, As many a lonely hour can tell, Since that, too fatal, dream.

XXII

Broken in heart, and warn with pair, I sought my former haunts again ; But with a hope, that time would prove A softener of the guef, I bore, Or, that it might perhaps remove. What it hath, since, but fixed the more. Cursed with a spirit, proud and shy, I had few friends, might vex or bless ; I had enough, nor sought to try; If I might make them, more or less; For my own mind, with dreams was rife, Of scenes, and forms, from mume life, And sought companionship from none, But mused on times, and tales by gone; Still I could see, that of the few, I had, the number still less grew ; As if, there were some mystery, Some guit or shame, they knew not what : Nor cared .- so they had cause for hate, Or sought to have, -which is the same ; I scorned them, nor would undeceive; What could the fooish men believe, That I would hisk my Lilloo's name, For their regards, with scorn or blame? Tis true, I panted to avenue Her crnel, and untimely fate, But I could trust to my revenge, That day should come, or soon or late .-Their follies I could laugh to scorn; But vamly sought to find rehef, For my own heart, that mly torn, Bled, o'er its first, and deepest grief; Each scene, I saw, recalled the past, And that, the one which was her last; Tho' foes ought, well, have pitted me, From friends, I met hut calminy; I left the place, but mly swore, That I would visit it, once more, (To be continued.)

of Police and the Chairman of the Calcutta 'Corporation will receive him at Prinsep's Ghat. Of course a sainte will be fired. A detachment of the GovernorGeneral's Bodyguard will escort Lord Elgin to Government House.

THE Levée will be held on Monday, the 16th December, at 9 30 P. M. Cards should be sent to the Aid-de-Camp in Waiting not later than Wednesday, the 4th December. A change is annunced as regards new presentations. It has been recently ruled, though that rule is not strictly enforced, that, as in Drawing Rooms, presenters at Levées should themselves be present. The eligibility of new Durbans is indeed enquired into, but the supervision has not always been thorough, it being usually left to the Police to pass or not a new comer. For want of time presenters could not always be informed of the fate of their nominees. Thus the unaccepted were left free to how to the Viceroy though to be ignored in the published List. The new regulation is perhaps intended to absolutely exclude from Government House the ineligible, "Gentlemen who propose to present others must send in writing the names of such gentlemen to the Aid-de-Camp in Waiting, in order that they may be submitted to His Excellency the Viceroy for His Excellency's approval, when presentation cards will be forwarded." The restriction cannot but be salutary. We would also suggest an official publication of the Levée List after the ceremony.

The new rule is also made applicable to Drawing Rooms. The Viceroy and the Counters of Eigin will hold the next Drawing Room on the night of Thursday, the 19th December at the usual hour of 9-30. Cards must reach the Aid-de-Camp in waiting by Monday, the 9th of December.

Another regulation cunfirms what has grown to be a practice. "Clergymen being University graduates and other gentlemen entitled to wear robes or gowns on account of judicial or academical office or status should appear in such robes or gowns." The Judges of the Calcutta High Court used to appear in scarlet gowns. But they recently held that black would do as well. The Military Secretary's potification, insists on no particular colour.

We'do not understand the emphasis laid on written names for new presentations. Does it exclude printed cards? These are certainly more convenient than written names.

THE Honourable Colonel John Pennycuick, Royal Engineers, Chie Engineer and Secretary to the Government of Madias, Public Works Department, and an Additional Member of the Council of the Governor of Madras for making Laws and Regulations, has been created out of season, a Companion of the most Exalted Order of the Star of India. It may therefore be taken as a double distinction. The occasion for the honour is the completion, of the Periyar irrigation works which were opened by Lord Wenlock last week.

THE old gradation of seniority in the Punjab Chief Court, where the senior Judge stood heir to the Chief, has been done away with. At its sitting, on the 17th instant, on the motion of the Extraordinary Member the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, the Supreme Legislative Council empowered the Governor-General to select the directing head.

THE same Council declared ex-King Theebaw incapable of making contracts. His past indebtedness will be enquired into by a Commission. He must make over to his creditors what little he may still call his own, maintain himself by what the British Government will pay him and not run into debt.

DOCTORS Lawrie and Jordon of Hyderabad have found that Laveran's makera crescent is nothing but altered white blood cells whose vitality is impaired or crippled by malarious fever. This, it is said, explains the action of the drug in reducing malarial spicen, also probably its action as a tonic. Is the discovery of any immediate practical use?

SINCE Monday, a New Zealander, a patented Professor from Australia and New Zealand, is electrifying Calcutta society. He professes to care all ills the haman flesh has imbibed since the creation of The range of his operations includes both man and woman, but no boys, little girls, babes at arms, and objectionable persons, whatever that may mean, for we find from an advertisement that these were not to be admitted to the lectures preparatory to the cures. There is no fixed clouge for the treatment, but it depends upon the state of the patient or perhaps the length of his purse. The Professor "undertakes to cure, in any part of India, Ruleis, Princes, Prin. cesses, Governore, who may be afflicted and given up as incurable." The Government of India may well utilize his stay in this continent to put to rights all afflicted Local Administrations and Native States. THE Times publishes a telegram from Constantinople stating that the Sultan accepts the reforms for Armenia as proposed by the Powers, but, to save the appearance of yielding to pressure, declines to promulgate them at once. Renter's correspondent telegraphs that the Ambassadors of the Powers and Said Pasha, the Foreign Minister, on the 15th, agreed to a modification of the proposed reforms including the appointment of a Christian Commissioner, who will be charged to execute the same. The Sultan has issued an irade approving of them It is feared that this acceptance does not settle the question from the Armenian point of view, while at the same time it increases the discurrent existing among the Mussalman liberals.

It is reported from Lebaum in Asiatic Turkey that excitement prevails there, and that fatal conflicts have taken place in that region between the Druses and Matuali Druses. The latter complain of Turkish injustice.

The question that is now being discussed is what find is to be in the charge—the Post Office of the Imperial? Mr. Sindell, Comptroller, Colcutta Past Office, objects to the Postal accounts being saddled with the soin, as the clock will not add to the income of the Post O file, but be an ornament to the Cipital. He mily as well claim a payment for allowing the use of the dome for the particular purpose. A cleverer head is sure to shift the hurden to the Municipality, for the clock will be an attraction of the city.

The result is not a surprise to the knowing. The enquiry was statted when the Gaekwar and the Head of the Survey Department were absent from India. The accused was confident of what the end of the Commission's report would be. As a most loyal assistant, he was strong in the strength of bis chief. The Gaekwar satisfies all parties by pronouncing the accused not guilty and sending him away. It is yet to be seen whether he is punished at all. The final proceedings suggest the query-Why was the Commission sauctioned and expenses incurred if the Commissioners were to report on bicomplete papers and imperfect evidence? Or is it that they went beyond then powers to be overruled? After all, there may be substantial justice in the order

THE following letter (dated Calculta Custom House, August 27) over the signature Francis H. Skrine, F. S. S., Officiating Collector of Sea Customs, appeared in the Times of September 17.

"The reimposition of the ditires on cotton gonds has evoked a storm of disapproval in the producing districts at home. The approviding about to take a definite shipe, and will be directed by an organization with Parlamentary influence and all the devices known to agustions at its command. The defence is proveibably weaker than the attack. In this connoversy the disproportion is more marked than usual by reason of the vast difference in the resonces of the contending parties. To a solid phalanx inspired by self-interest, the most priverful morties known to human mattie, and able to make itself heard both in Parliament and without, we can oppose only a disjointed body with few things in common, divided in counsels, and ignorant of the machinery of political warfare. Here public opinion and representative institutions exist unity in embryo; and, in spite of all that has been said flate as to the increased speed and pinicitiality of commonications with India, it is still a very distant country, and the echo of events as a quantité nig tigeable.

Again and again have our interests been sacrificed to the exigencies of party warfare in the home exchequer. Those who are in the side of truth and pistice have found a powerful any in the Times. Mainchester, to give the word an extended sense, alleges that the cutom drives infringe a principle of free trade resembles liberty as apostro-pluzed by Mine. Roland, for it has been made an excuse for many of those libracers which are worse than crimes. In this case, however, the fetish does not come into play at all. Cobden hunself did not disapprove of the taxation of manufactured goods, provided that its object were purely fiscal. That India stands in migent need of money no one who has considered Sn. James Westland's last bidget can doubt; and it will be not very official to prove that the duies on conton were levised at Indian points are not princetive.

Now, on examining the recent satisfies of exputs of cotton goods from Manchester, what do we find? A temporary check following on the imposition of the difference of the according more than the minimal volume. The first was nevitable. It is never possible to discount the immediate effect in markets of any fiscal change, and importers invariably contract their operations in such cases must hely are in a position to gange their position and the purbable future of the trade in which they are embarked.

So much for Calcutta, the port in which I am personally interested. So much for calcula, the port in which I am personally interested, Let us now glance at the exports from Manchester to the four pricipal ports of the empire. My figures are taken from the monthly circular of Messre, Studies, Straker, and Co., who are generally regarded by the trade as trustworthy guides. They appear to inclinde exports down to the end of the first week in Angust; hence they do not exactly tally with those recorded by the statistical branch of my office. As in my previous statement, mulions are omitted and yards understood

Thus the temporary depression has been filled up, and Manchester has no reason to fear the effect of the cotton duries. The fact that a revival of trade has seen in is admitted in the last report received here of that very useful and energetic body the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. In the face of these subborn facts who shall say that our export duties have the faintest flavour of protection?"

Mr. Skiine is a man of versatile talents, wonderful energy and strong sense of dary. He has hard the Bengalt community noder a deep debt of gratitude by his recent book. He is no less immoful of the interests of the Indian continent. In that letter to the Times he exposes the fallacy of the English agitation against the Indian cotton dunes. It has, as it was bound to do, made much stir in Manchester. Even against the practice of the London press, other journals reproduced u, and u has been widely discussed. They admit that Mr. Skrine's figures are accurate, but urge that those for 1893 with which he compares those of 1895 were exceptionally low from exceptional causes-strikes at Oldham, &c. The main point of the letter, however, remains unchallengednamely, that the exports of cotton goods from Manchester, after a check in the beginning of the year, railied to more than normal, taken over a series of years, in June and July,

If his letter can stem the title of opposition to the cotton duties, Mr. Skime will have done no small service to the Government of India. It is difficult to believe that a man with such a strong sense of duty and justice would be wanting in the ordinary discharge of official work. Yer, for no other offence than of spannig an old officer an indignity in his old age, Mr. Skrine is found fault with in the acministration of the Department in his charge, by men who resent his activity in an arena where they are accustomed to lord ii, who mistake his celerity for imperiousness, who cannot forgive him his impatience of stupidity, and denomice him because he is the victim of displeasure of a questionable high quarter.

PANDIT Shamir Kushna Varma who only the other day succeeded the late Haridas Vibraridas Dosai as Dewan of the Junagadh State has gone back to Oodeypore as member of the Mahendray Sabha or State Council. The new Dewan is Sardar Behechardas Vibaridas Desai. We do not know him, but as younger brother of our much esteemed friend the late Dewan Harross, we give him welcome.

SAKTI WORSHIP AND MISSIONARY PAMPHLETEERS.

THE present being the season of worship of the great Sakti goddesses, it may not be inappro-priate to give an account of the origin and nature of the Sakta cult, and to draw attention to the current erroneous notions on the subject. According to the popular view, Sakti worship is the name of the cult which attaches greater importance to the adoration of the consorts of Siva than to that of any other deity. The word Sakti literally means "energy" or "power," and, taking into consideration what is recorded in Tantric scriptures, it seems to be used in the sense m which the word "power" is used in English when a person is spoken of as a political or spiritual power. Some of the Babu exponents of modern Hinduism have been led to believe and preach that the soldiers and their commanders were led by their the Sakti of the Tantrics denotes the same thing as the Sakti of the Families defined the terms 'energy" and "force" of modern science. Such misuse of scientific terms by men of religion has been common enough in India from remote antiquity. Its prevalence among the Hindu graduates of the Calcutta University is somewhat of a marvel.

In Bengal, Sakti worship is usually identified with that of the goddess Kali, who has not only many permanent shrines in this part of the country, but is worshipped temporarily also on certain red letter days of the Hindu calendar, especially on the night of the new moon of October. The form given her must be well-known to every one who has ever been in Bengal, but its meaning is not known to any except the learned in the Shastras. Dr. Murdoch, in his pamphlet entitled "Swami Vivekananda on Hinduism," describes the goddess thus:

Hinduism," describes the goddess thus:

"She is represented as a black woman, with four arms. In one hand she has a weapon, in another the head of the giant she has slain; with the two others she is encouraging her worshippers. For earrings she has two dead bodies; she wears a necklace of skulls; her only clothing is a girdle made of dead men's hands. After her victory over the giant, she danced so furiously that the earth trembled beneath her weight. At the request of the gods, Siva asked her to stop; but, as owing to the excitement, she did not notice him, he lay down among the slain. She continued dancing till she caught sight of her husband under her feet; upon which, in Hindu fashion, she thrust out her tongue to express which, in Hindu fashion, she thrust out her tongue to express surprise and regret."

This is the popular explanation. The true meaning is very different. We certainly do not approve of the spirit in which Dr. Murdoch has commented on the doctimes and practices of the Hindu religion in this and other passages. If the image of Kali, for instance, represented nothing more than what he has described it, the tone of contempt pervading his remarks could well the regarded quite imjustifiable. As a matter of fact, the mage has a far worse significance. Though it may sometimes be necessary to lay bare its imperfections, yet we must not be taken to admit that there is any religion which stands on a higher platform than our ancient faith. In our view, almost all the religious systems which men have been taught to follow, have the same character, the difference being only in the degree of development.

In its essential nature, Sakti-worship is the counterpart of Siva-worship. The latter is, probably, a more ancient cult than the former. This chronology is borne out not only by the historical data obtainable about them but also by a priori considerations. The researches of actiquarians have established that Saiva worship. Risted in India before the commencement of the Christian cra. But the history day. Above all, one beautiful feature of the vijaya of Sakti adoration cannot be carried back to a is the build of all animosities of the year very early period. If Ananda Lahart be the work man and man in a loving and affectionate e of Sankaracharya, then Sakti-worship may have exist-ed in some esoteric form during the early cen-acquaintances meeting acquaintances, for the turies of Christ. But its more overt forms, such as time after that day, will bow, the junior Doorga, Kali and Jagatdhatri, are more or less of senior, and embrace each other in a spirity peace recent growth. The Doorga Puja, which is the and love. The Vijaya pronam or salutation-to most ancient of the three, and in all probability, ence, and the Vijaya ashirbid or blessing, is in the control of the three of Malki, when it was the control of the three of Malki, when it was the control of the Vijaya ashirbid or blessing, is in the control of the three of Malki, when it was the control of the Vijaya ashirbid or blessing. most ancient of the three, had, in all probability, ence, and the Vijaya assirvate of obessing is in the tiss origin in the town of Nadia, when it was the most attractive feature of the Doorga Pooja, That metropolis of Bengal. The name of the deity, the natural worship of Doorga should ensure the natural prescribed for its celebration strongly support the inference that she was worshipped by both innovator having set the practice as an emple the Hindu kings and their military officers as the presiding goddess of forts. In the rainy season, all military operations necessarily came to a stand-to a date within the memory of living mea.

priests to celebrate the worship, on a grand scale, of the goddess of forts. If this view be correct, then the worship must have commenced at a time when the country was ruled by Hindu kings. If, again, it had its origin in the town of Nadia, then it cannot be of an earlier date than the ninth century of the Christian era, as that was the earliest period when the great seat of Sanskrit learning in Bengal was also its metropolis.

The suggestion that N idia was the birthplace of the greatest Hindu festival of Bengal, is supported by various facts and circumstances. To begin with: the most important materials for the Puja are obtainable more readily in Nadia and its neighbourhood than in any other part of India. Then, again, the Puja is celebrated with the greatest eclat in and around Nadia, and is hardly known even by name in the frontier districts of the province. view stated above is, to some extent, established by the tradition, preserved in a doggerel, according to which the Rajas of Dinajpore were the first in wealth, and while the House of Nator owed its pre-eminence to its public works, and that of Burdwan to gifts of rent-free lands, the Nadia Rajas surpassed them all in the magnificence of their Doorga Puja. Though these observations apply to the state of things existing in the last century, yet it does not seem unreasonable to regard them as warranting the supposition that, in celebrating the Doorga Puja with miusual pomp, the ancestors of the present Raja of Nadia followed only the tradition which they inherited from their predecessors. Lastly, the fact that Raghimandan of Nadia was the first of the human authors, who have written about the ritual of the Doorga Puja, goes also a great way to establish that the inspired writers on the subject, who originated the worship, were also of the same place. The Panranic myth about the worship of Doorga is that Rama, finding it extremely difficult to conquer Rayana, the demon King of Lanka, invoked Doorga unseasonably, that is in autumn, although the usual time for worshipping that deity is the spring. To this day, in Bengal and several other parts of India, Doorga is worshapped in a few families in the spring season. But the practice is more general of worshipping her in autumn. It is said that after the conclusion of the Tace. inds

As to Kali worship in the form which prevails in Bengal, a tradition ascribes it to Krishnanand Agam Bagish of Nadia, who lived in the fifteenth century of the Christian era. The Jagailhatri is well known to have been introduced by the Nadia Rajas of the last century.

Ouite irrespective of historical data, it may be readily conceded that the adoration of the female principle is a more recent invention than Saiva To the mendicants and priests who introduced both, nothing could be more agreeable and politic than to maintain an attitude of passiveness and indifference, and to lead their fair votaries to seek for them. But experience evidently showed them that, in spite of the constant utterance of the formula, Sivoham, by which they claimed to be the god Siva incarnate, it was not possible to make their followers worship them as such, or adore anything beyond only a stone or clay emblem. The Sivite cult imposes a policy of masterly juactivity. Sakti-worship allows more aggressive proceedings and has, therefore, in many parts of India, superseded Saivism more or less. Sakti-worship is not of a more refined character than Saivism, and so both are being thrown into the shade by the cleverer device of Radha-worship, which proves far more effective by appealing to the imitative spirit of its votaries.

The adoration of Sakti, in its primary form, being, from its very nature, too much for the unsophisticated, is very rare in practice, though not quite unknown. The most prevailing forms are the adoration of the yantra, and of the clay or stone image of a woman in dishabille mounted on an image of Siva equally draped. The first is a triangular plate of copper or brass forming part of every Sakta Brahman's penates. In absence of the plate, the Sakta worshipper would offer his daily adoration to a triangle painted on a salver. The worship of the plate and the painted triangle is, of course, esoteric. By the great mass of the uninitiated, Saktl is worshipped in the form of a clay or stone image of Kali mounted on Siva, both being "sky-clad" to use the usual Sanskrit mode of expression. According to the scriptures of the sect, the best form of adoration is to make the offerings to a breathing statue. The next approved object of Tantric worship is the emblematic geometrical figure. The worship of inanimate images and paintings is the least meritorious of all.

In the image of Kali usually seen in Bengal, the goddess is placed in a standing posture on the breast of her lord. That, however, is not the proper attitude of the deity to which the Sakta is required to bow down. It is the nearest approach to the Shastric pose which the devout, always better than his religion, can exhibit before the public. Those acquainted with the Dhyana or the descriptive hymn that the worshipper utters either mentally or aloud, know what the characteristics of the image are as laid down in the scriptures. It is said that Agam Bagish himself invented the image that we see.

THE ORIGIN OF THE QUARTERLY REVIEW

A VERY good hand-hank of the history of English literature is Mr. Thomas B. Shiw's, edited with notes and illustrations by Dr. William Smith, and published by John Murray The book has passed through many editions. That of t889 was the seventeenth. A mass of valuable information has been carefully compressed within a buef space. The volume is deservedly popular. The criticisms are for the most part sound and agree with the accepted verdicts of literary sensibilities not having been at all delicate, he did not think that men of reputation. Here and there the author speaks in the first person singular. On such occasions he always makes some instructive observation that visibly adds to our stock of knowledge. For even grown up men it is impossible to read the remarks on the great productions of English genius in different departments of literature without feeling the desire of renewing their acquaintance. In the case of young students, those observations are sure to what their curiosity and lead them to take up the original works for study and examination. The Calcutta University has acted wisely by including this excellent volume in the curriculum of the higher examinations.

Carefully edited though the work has been by Dr. Smith, who, perhaps, has worked more earnestly than others for the students of schools and colleges in both England and the colomies, some assertions have found a place in it that do not exactly accord with facts. One such is to be met with in p. 527. Referring to the establishment of the Quarterly Review, it is said, "The influence which the Edinburgh Review soon acquired was exercised in favour of political principles opposed to those of the existing administration; and its authority in maiters of literature and taste became almost paramount. Under those circum stances the late Mr. Murray, after consulting Mr. Canning and other distinguished politicians and men of letters, determined in 1809 to start a new review to counteract the danger of those liberal opinions which seemed to be menacing the very integrity of the constitution This new periodical, which was called The Quarterly Review, was warmly welcomed by the friends of the Government, and immediately obtained a literary reputation at least equal to that of the Edinburgh." As a matter of fact, it was not in 1809 but in 1807 that John Murray first thought of bringing out a periodical in the Tory interest. On the 25th of September 1807, Murray addressed a letter to Canning. That epistle was first published in the Autobiography of Barrow who was one of the most active contributors to the Quarterly during the first few years of its life. Here is the document in full.

" Sir .- I venture to address you upon a subject that is, perhaps, not undesorving of one moment of your attention.

"There is a work entitled the Eninburgh Review written with such unquestionable talent that it has already attained an extent of curulation not equalled by any similar publication. The principles of this work are, however, so radically bad, that I have been led to consider the effect which such sentiments, so generally diffused, are likely to produce, and to think that some means equally popular ought to be adopted to counteract their dangerons tendency. But the publication in question is conducted with so much ability, and is sanctioned and circulated with such high and decisive authority by the party of whose opinions it is the organ, that there is little hope of producing against it any effectual opposition, nuless it urise from you, Sir, and from your friends. Should you, Sir, think the idea worthy of encouragement, I should, with equal pride and willingness, engage my ardunus exertion to promote its success, but as my object is nothing short of producing a work of the greatest talent and importance, I shall entertain it no longer, if it be not so fortunate as to obtain the high patronage which I have thus, Sir, taken the liberty to solicit.

"Permit me to add, Sir, that the person who thus addresses you is no adventurer, but a man of some property, including a business that has been established for nearly half a century. I, therefore, trust that my application will be attributed to its proper motives, and that your goodness will at least pardon its intrusion.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, &c., &c., " JOHN MURRAY."

Canning, it is said, read the letter, and laid it aside, without honousing it with a reply. Two months before the date of Murray's letter, Scott and Southey had been corresponding about the Edinburgh Review, Southey saying that he felt himself mable to keep up his connection with a periodical of such political views, and Scott heartily agreeing in condemning the general tone of the Review in both politics and literature. Early in 1808, a very severe article came out in the Edinburgh Review on Marmion which had been recently published. Constable was owner of three-fourths of the copyright of the new poein, yet that fact had no weight with Jeffiey in reviewing it freely and severely. Indeed, the perfect freedom with which every subject was handled and the utter independence of the trade which the Edinburgh displayed on all occasions, were the causes of its remarkable and immediate success. As regards Jeffrey himself, his he had done anything at which Scott could be offended. He even sent the article to Scott with a note stating that he would come to dinner I on the day he name i. Spott, though wounded, concealed it. Mrs. Scott, however, was very cold in her manner, and as Jeffrey was taking leave, she broke forth, numble to restrain her pique, in her broken English,-" Weil, guid nign, Mr. Jeff iy; dey tell me you have abused Scott in the Review; and I hope Mr. Constable has paid you well for writing it" Murray, on reading the atticlefelt that Scott could not continue his connection any longer with a periodical that treated him so harshly and, as he thought, so unfairly. An active correspondence was the result between Murray, Scott, and Southey. The arrangements were made silently but earnestly. Gifford, the biting satirist of the Baviad and Maviad and brilliant editor of the Auti Jacobin, was selected for editing the Quarterly Review as the new magazine was called. It was believed that he would ourrival Jeffrey. It was on the 1st of February, 1809, that the first number came out. To the second number Canning contributed. As the Edinburgh had been taken as the madel, especially in the liberal payment of all contributors, Canning had to accept the payment of ten guineas per sheet for his article. It should be known, however, that in the preliminary arrangements that led to the establishment of the Quarterly, Canning had played a very inferior part. In fact, long after the receipt of Mr. Murray's letter, all that he did was to write to a personal friend of his, and that at a time when the rebellion against the Edinburgh and Jeffrey had already drawn to a head. The conspirators had formed their plan, without the slightest reference to Canning.

The following extract regarding the success of the first number of the Quarterly may not be uninteresting. "According to tradition there were high jinks at Muriay's shop in Fleet Street when the first comes arrived from the binders; a titumphal column of the books 'was raised aloft in solemn joy in the counting-house, the best wine in the cellar was uncorked, and glasses in hand John Murray and assistants danced jubilant round the pile. The pile, however, did not long remain, as so many famous columns have done to mack the hope of their builders, but the whale issue was sold almost immediately, and a second edition was called for."

It should be remembered that it was Jeffrey who first raised the connection of literary men with periodicals and newspapers to one of dignity and emolument by insisting on a liberal payment to every contributor. No contribution was admitted that was not paid for, Constable, who for his liberality to authors, had earned the title of "Czar of Muscovy," never interfered with Jeffrey in the conduct of the Edinburgh and always accepted his recommendation about the honorariums to be paid to contributors. It was by fallowing this rule of liberal payment that the Quarterly succeeded in riv ling the blue and yellow. The following extract gives the internal history of the Quarterly: "Barrow was introduced (to Giffird) and contributed, in all, no less than one hundred and ninety-five articles on every subject, from China to Life Assurance' After Burrow and Croker, Southey was, perhaps, the most prolific; to the first hundred and twenty-six numbers he contributed ninety-four articles-many of them of great permanent value-and to him Mirray amformly exhibited a generosity abnost without parallel, For an article on the 'Lives of Nelson,' he received twenty gumeas a sneet, dannie what Southey himself acknowledged to be nimple, and he was affered £100 to enlarge the article into a volume, and having exceeded the estimated quantity of print, Murray paid him double the amount stipulated, adding another 200 guineas when the book was resed for the 'Family Library,' For the review of the 'Life of Wellington, Southey got £100, and he thought the sum so large that he himself calls it 'a rid colons price ;' yet this ridiculous price be continued to receive, and he was in the habit of saying that he was as much overpaid for his articles by Murray as he was underpaid for the rest of his works for other publishers. 'Madec, of which he had great hopes, brought him £3 19x-1d. for the first twelvemonth, and the three volumes of his 'History of the Brazils,' scarcely paid their expenses of publication."

The Quarterly gave Murray at once a pre-emmence in the Lundon trade, by bringing him into contact with the chief Conseivative statesmen, and with the principal literary men in England Like Constable, his generosity was rewarded by the title of "Emperor of the West." He soon removed from Fleet to Albemarie Street. His drawing-room, at four o'clinck, became the favourite resort of all the statesmen, and with the principal literary men in England Like talent in literature and in art that London then possessed. There it was his custom to assemble together such men as Byron, Scott, Moure, Cimpbell, Southey, Gifford, Hallam, Lickhart, Washington Irving, and Mis. Somerville. He invited such arrists as Laurence, Wilkie, Phillips, Newton, and Pickersgill, to meet those literary hous and to paint them that they might hang on his walls. The dinners of Murray were highly spoken of. They rivalled those of kings. Byron makes Murray say, in his mock enistle to Dr. Palidon-

Murray had business talents of a high order. In this he excelled his great rival of the North, for Canstable never liked to look at a balance sheet. Accordingly, when the great crash of 1826 came, which swept away both Constable and Scott, John Morray was comparatively unoffected. The only unsuccessful venture in which Murray had engaged was the Representative Seeing that the Quarterly had succeeded as a Tory orgin, it was resulted to start a high class Tory daily. Though well informed and well-written, it gave up the struggle after a bosef existen e of six months. The Times proved the victor. When any young speculator, after this, proposed to Murray to start a daily paper, he used to point to a ledger on his book-shelves and say girmly, " Twenty thousand pounds he buried there."

Although the Quarterly succeeded in realising the expectations of its founders, yet even in its palmiest days it was but a party organ. Even its literary criticisms were coloured by party considerations. It was professedly an autidote to the poison of the Edinburgh. That poison, however, without being neutralised by the antidote, proved to be of immense service in curing the nation of many grave maladies. We shall close our reference to the two great periodicals by an extract from Sydney Smith. The picture, though coming from the pen of one of the original projectors of the Edinburgh, is not at all overdrawn. Writing in 1839, he said:—

"To appreciate the value of the Edinburgh Review, the state of England at the period when that journal began should be had in remembrance. The Catholics were not emancipated—the Corporation and Test Acts were unsepealed—the Game Liws were hursibly oppressive—Steel Truss and Spring Gams were set all over the country—Prisoners tried for their Lives could have no Counsel—Lord Eldon and the Court of Chancery pressed heavily on mankind—Libel was punished by the most cruel and vindicative imprisonments—the principles of Pointial Economy were little understood—the laws of Debi and Con prizacy were upon the worst possible footing—the enormous wickedness of the Scave Frade was tulerated—a thousand evils were in existence, which the talents of good and able men have since lessend or removed; and these effects have been not a little assisted by the honest boldness of the Edinburgh Review."

Mookerjee. The life, letters and correspondence of this cultured and broad-minded man have now been published under the title of "An Indian Journalist," by

Dr. Mookerjee was well worthy of the dis-tinction accorded, so far as we know, to no other Native journalist in India, of having an English Civilian for his biographer, but the honour is well in keeping with the life of its subject, who for many years enjoyed the personal friendship of distinguished ivilians, of Provincial Governors, and of successive Viceroys. Mr. Skine has performed his self-imposed task in no patronising manner, but in the spirit of one who while delighting to do honour to a great and good man does not hile his fobles. The subject of the biography was not free from faults, and Mi. Skrine does not attempt to make him appear otherwise. We are glad to We are glad to that in dedicating the book to Sir William Hunter, the author raises his voice against the "persistent vituperation" heaped upon the race from which Di Mookerjee sprang. Some years ago Sir F. Monat, one Inspector-General of Jails, told the London Statistical Society (but he considered that in the matter of truth and honesty the Bengalis were neither better nor worse than many nations boasting of a higher civilization or a puret-tail; and that they "in no degree mainted the wholesale con-demnation with which they was generally visited by those who wrote and talked much but really knew very little of them." Mr. Skithe is evidently of the same opinion and puts these demactors of the Bengilis into two classes, those who know no thing of them and have been dazzled by "the billiant sophisties of Macaulty"; and those who judge the race by the "cringing sycophanis who dance attendance in high officials' ante-rooms or belong to families who during a century of intercourse with us in the equal have has some of their native vitines without acquiring out." The more closely Englishmen are brought into acquiritance with the Benguli language and character the less likely they are to fill into these errors. But on this side of India people form their estimate of the inhabitants of the Lower Provinces not so much from Ma aulay's bulliant sophistries as from what they have tall real respecting the vernacular prints of Bengal, which, how ver, represent the views of writers bent on doing their little b at to throw mud on the British administration rather than the true pushe opinion of Bengal. The basis of the estimate is therefore a wrong one, and it should not be forgotten that there are papers and papers and that as much difference exists between some of the tabil Calentia prints, and the paper which Dr. Mookerjee founded as between darkness and light, Reis and Rayyet has always been remarkable for the mingled whiley, candour and churitableness of its criticisms, and the periodical has enjoyed a degree of influence approached by no periodical has enjoyed a logice of must be provided in the mixture weekly. The paper was so well managed by its founder as to attract general notice and bring him into confidential r bejons with the makers of history. In the words of his biographer, "it sohered his judgment, and deepened his sense of responsthilling the two qualifications which the native portradists whom Dr. Mookerjee has left behind, should cultivate as being essential to those who, exercising a formative influence over their fellows, Chere was in the mind of Di. Mookery e a constant stringle between the liberal impulses born of his learning and his wide knowledge of literature on the one hind, and his inherited preindices on the other. It is characterists of the largeness of his heirt that in this struggle it was the restrictions which hampered his usefulness to his fellows that succombal, rather than those which went against his own personal empyments. True to his Bia'umin descent he abstained for the greater part of his life from animal food and even from fish, and deterence to the persistent entreaties of his friends that in the closing years of his cateer he adopted the more stimulating his me hell a lyisers considered necessary. His belief in the brotherhood of man and his desire to lighten the burdens of others showed themselves in innumerable directions. In his marning wilks he would often stop and inverse with the Municipal sweepers, and would question them respecting their caste and social customs. In the same way to would when relieving "losfers" enter into earnest conversation with them. It is related that on one occasion he kept a great waiting for supper for some time, while talking to a palki-b-tree. He deemed the comfort of his servants of greater importance than his own; and when they had refried to rest he would never allow them to be disturbed on any prefext. He would spend his time, brains and money in the interests of his friends without stint, and indeed found it impossible not to make a liberal response to the calls of friendship or of distress. From this cause he was prevented from making anything like the provision for his family which as Mr. Skrine remarks "is every day effected by men without a tithe of his mental gifts, but also without a tithe of his milk of human kind-Rank was repeatedly pressed upon him, but his sturdy independence led him to refuse it; and his high-minded con tempt of mere sordid gain caused him to neglect his many oppor-tunities for acquiring wealth. .....

The greater pair of this most interesting biography of one whom India could ill-afford to lose, is occupied with extracts from the correspondence which Dr. Mookerjee had with all soits and tions of men. These letters have been placed at Mr. Skrine's disposal by the friends of the deceased journalist, and he has a wise restraint in the case of the letters of the Marquis of Dufferin, Sir Auckland Colvin, and Sir Charles Elliott for, to use his own words, the time has not yet come when opinions expressed by these administrators in unguarded intercourse should be given to the world. A few letters from living administrators which there is no reason to hold back are, however, given including one Lord Dufferin wrote to Dr. Mookerjee, from the including one Lord Dufferin wrote to Dr. Mookerjee, from the Embassy at Rome in 1890, in which the says; "that Lord Lansdowne should like and appreciate you was certain, and I am sure that your admiration for him will increase as you become better acquainted with him." Lord Lansdowne was the last Viceroy whose friendship the Cilcutta journalist was destined to enjoy, for Lord Elgin had only assumed office a few days when Dr. Mookerjee succumbed to the astimatic troubles to which he had long been a victim, and in consequence of which he had years before joined the great anny of optimizations. takers. Sir John Ardagh wrote a letter of condolence on he half of the new Viceroy, which stated that his Excellency had heard with much regret of the ileath of one whose reputation as an able and independent witter was well known to him and whose acquaintance he was looking forward to making. Among : the many interesting reminiscences with which the volum-abounds, may be mentioned an incident which illustrates the tendency shown by Sir Richard Temple, then Lieutenant Governor of Bengil, throughout his whole career in India to allow no matter of public interest to escape his notice, and it need be his interposition. Dr. Mookerjee, who was a man of wide cosmopolitan sympathies, joined with the late Nawao Abdool Luteet in organizing a public meeting for the purpose of congratulating the Turks on their successes at Plevna, in the congratulating the Turks on their successes at Flevon, in the cally stages of the Russo-Turkish war. Regarding the demon stration as being likely to offend Muscovite susceptibilities. St. Richard Temple interdicted it. The aggreived Mahours and sought the aid of Dr. Mookeijee and he advised an app al in higher quariers. Accordingly an appeal was made with success; the maxing was held; and we suppose no one was a penaly the worse for it. Dr. Mookerjee may be placed with the still laminted Justice. Felang in the category of those nerves of this country who are connecting links between rulers and ruled, and who by their labours, as well as by their promal example and influence, do immense service in welding tegether the diverse communities of the land in the bonds of 4.1 crial brotherhood and loyalty.

(From the Pioneer, October 5, 1895.)

For much of the biographical matter that issues so freely from the press an apology is needed. Had no biography of Dr. Mookerjee, the Editor of Rets and Rayyet, appeared, an exploration would have been looked for. A man of his remarkable pervendity, who was easily first among native Indian journalists, and a many respects occupied a bigher plane than they did, and loved at public affairs from a different point of view from theirs, could not be suffered to sink into oblivion without some attempt to percetuate his memory by the usual expedient of a "life." The difficulties common to all biographers have in this case been increased by

DEAFNESS COMPLETELY CURED! As when a differing from Deafness, Noises in the Head, &c., may learn of a complete treatment, which is proving very successful in completely conformal kinds. special circumstances, not the least of which is that the author belongs to a different race from the subject. It is true that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the learned Doctor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreignthat he on the sade discussions the English Character as new foreign-ers understand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assimi-lation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mookerjee remained to the last a Brahman of the Brahmans --- a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and approval. In consequence of this, his ideal biographer would have approvan. In consequence of this in the same inherited sympathies and trained like him in Western learning. If Bengal had produced such another man as Dr. Mookerjee, it was he who should have written his life. On another ground one feels, after reading the volume, not dissatisfied but unsatisfied. Written so soon after the events with which it deals, the life and letters necessarily indithe events with which it dears, the me and rected acceptance at the suppression of matter that would probably have been suppression than any that has been published. Mr. Skrine has exercised a judicious reserve, the necessity for which he may regret as much as his readers, and the result is very obvious incompleteness. Unfortunately, the desire to know more is likely to remain ungratified, for interest in the circumstances will have passed away before publication becomes no longer indiscreet. Of all men the editor of a newspaper is and should be least before the public in his own person, and long after his death the seal of the editorial confessional must remain unbroken.

Of the execution of the task by Mr. Skrine it is impossible not to speak favourably in view of the difficulties he hid to face. He has made the most of the materials placed at his disposal, and we cannot grumble at the restraint he has exercised. The perfect biographer is a man of the stamp of Boswill, who sinks his own personality, who has no views himself and no desire to display his learning and the extent of his reading. Mr. Skrine's is a personality not easily suppressed, nor, except for artistic reasons, would anyone wish it. It is impossible in reading the Leftern on to think of the writer as well as of the subject, to look in on him in his study and watch his methods of composition. We imagine, for instance, a carefully indexed commonplace book, which supplies on every other page quotations from "a Latin poet," the greatest of French novelists, Honoré de Balzac," "the anonymous editor of the letters of Bussy-Rabntin (Amsterdam 1738)," "an Irish member of Parliament of the last century" (who, an irrelevant note informs us, was "Richard Lovell Edgeworth of Edgeworths-town, father of the well-known novelust"). Attention is, in fact, distracted from the view by the officiousness of the guide. But it this is a flaw in the hographet's art, it furnishes incidentally some information on diverse subjects, some really interesting quotations, and makes us familiar with the writer's mental furniture and opinions. His reflections on the journalistic career, for instance, will awake a comfortable feeling of self-pity in the breast of every obscure newspaper-man:—

"The man of genius who, for his sins, embraces the calling of journalist is debarred from gratifying the "list infirmity of noble minds." His works are written on sand. They deal with ephemeral topics; and they are clean forgotten before the broadsheets which give them to the world are dry. The English custom of anonymity is to blame for this absence of a powerful educer of all that is best in a min; and there are many who think that this drawback outwrighs its admitted advantages. A youth who adopts this ungrateful profession must accept the in-withly, and will be fortunate if, by the time he is a grey-headed drulge, his tame is known to the brether of the quill and midnight oil. The great actor has a more enviable lot. His triumphs are equilly evanescent; but then he is sustained by the magnetism of applanse, sourred to excel kimself by the sympathy of his au lience; while the traditions of his feats long survive him. Mool-type was essentially a journalist; and the fact places his biographer at some disadvantage. For the gentle realer—like Napoleon when the nume of a candidate for employ was submitted to him—asks "What has be done?"

Mr. Skrine's views on early marriage are his own, and are at last evidence of independent in Igment. Dr. Mookerjee, it should be remarked, in explanation, was born in 1839 and was thus eighteen years of age at the time of his marriage. The event siggests the following paragraph:

"At a time when old England was ringing with stories of military and naval disasters Dr. Johnson remarked that public woes effected no man from eating his dinner as usual. People marry, and are given in marriage while their country's destinies are trem biling in the balance; and Dr. Mookerjee gave hostages to fortune during the throes of the last great stringgle for Empire, in 1857. His wife was a scope of the Bural Lamly of Jorasanko. This event was far from having the sinister influence on his mental development which is assigned to early marriages by self-atyled friends of Indig. They are stigmatised as the root of the decay which is consuming the country's manhood. That the children of the upper middle classes in many parts of Bengal are mere human weeds is but too evolent: but the cause of deterioration must be sought for in adverse physical conditions rather than in a custom which is hallowed by the acquiescence of a hundred generations Doctrinare-reformers forget that human nature is more powerful than convention, and that the sexual instinct is far stronger and is manifested at an earlier stage of life in the tropus than in temperate regions. The institution of marriage regulates this overwhelming impulse, just as law does the equally power ful craving for revenge. Hence marriages in early life are good in themselves and a cause of good to society; and would be reformers should ponder well the lessons afforded by countless ruined careers the outcome of an undue postponement of the nuptual rites."

The biography is warmly appreciative without being needlessly landatory; it gives on the whole a complete picture of the man, and in the book there is not a dull page. Dr. Samblu Chunder Mookerjee essared many parts, but was above all things, and almost in spite of himself, a journalist. As a boy at college he started a short-lived magazine; he was only a youth when he was appointed Editor of a daily paper in Calcutta; when he was not on the regular staff of a paper, the titch for writing made him a frequent contributor to the press. But he did not for a time realise that journalism was the profession for which he was best fitted. He was at different times Political Adviser, Nawah and Secretary to the Outh Taluqdars' Association, and twice he made attempts to join the legal profession, but in spite of a natural hent in the direction of the law, he failed for one reason or another to follow up his intention to the extent of qualifying himself for practice. It was as editor of Ren and Rayyet that he chiefly distinguished himself and exercised his greatest influence. The bulk of the letters reproduced at the end of his biography belong to this period, beginning in 1882 and ending with his death in 1894. During that time he carried on correspondence with Sir Auckland Colvin, Lord Dufferin, and other men of influence, only a few passages of which, for obvious reasons, have been published. One of these lettersfrom Sir Auckland Colvin—has so much personal interest that it was worth giving in full. It is dated Government House, Nami

Tal, May 27th, 1892, and runs thus :--"My dear Dr. Mookerjee,---I write to thank you for your tele

A few of the letters addresed to Dr. Mookerge, are of such

A few of the letters address to Dr. Mookerjes are of such minor importance that they might have been omitted with adjacing but not a word of his owell-tiers could have been spared. To say that he writes idiomitic English is to say what is short of the truth. His diction is easy tell correct, clear and straightforwird, without Ocionial luxurences or striving after effect. Perhaps he was never so charming as when he is laying down tho laws of literary form to young apprants to fame. The letter on page 235, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticism; it is deligated place in speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a would-be poet that his productions are not in the smallest degree poetry without, one may conclude, either offending the youth or repressing his ardour.

The letter from Professor Vambérv is also remirkable for its plain-sneaking. Dr. Mookerjee had written referring to the Mahamedan and Hindu communities, "My ideal is to form a nation by a harmonious social fusion of the two component parts of the population under the British Crown," a statement of his views that might have led anyon: una quanted with his commonruse methods to imagine him more of a visionary than he was Professor Vambery certainly addressed him in received as it he had received that impression. He says, writing from Budapest in December 1889 :---

"In presenting yourself as 'an exceptional person who has always loved the Mahomedans as brethren and has carnestly tried to interpret between Hindus and Mahomedaus and effect a innion of hearts between two peoples whose social and political interests in India are identical,' you have certainly put before yourself a very useful. are identical, you have certainly put before yourself a very useful, but at the same time a very ardious rask. As far as my limited experience and impretentious notions go, the solution of this problem in Asia has always seemed to me an innanswerable difficulty. You evidently know better than inviself, that in Asia the partition wall between mankind is not the nationality, but religion. a strict unity between the followers of one faith, and does not admit any partition by race or nationality. I am, therefore, at a loss to understand how your idea to form a nation by a harmonious social fusion of the two component parts of the population, sublime and high minded as that idea is, could be carried out without shaking the very foundation of the respective communities. Of course you are on the best way in proposing to effect that idea under the British Crown, which has given us such a strong and equitable Government as we could never hope to form ourselves; which has advanced us to a new life, and is daily improving us, and which I devoucly pray will keep us in hand until the time comes under God's Providence when we are in a position to help ourselves. This argument speaks decidedly whole volumes in favour of the soundness of your views. The time will and must come when many of our countrymen and co-religionists will share in these healthy riews, but I beg leave to say that this time is yet very, very far, and that it would be much easier to make all. Enrope one community of a common interest and aim, than to mould the What you have to do is to proceed on the way inaughrated by your British teachers without any premature aspirations unfit and eventually dang rous to the present stage of culture of the great mass of the peoples of India. Your hitherto made progress appears the best guarantee for the future development of India. You enjoy liberties which are the object of envy not only of all Asia and Russia, but also of many parts of Europe, and the benignant rays of liberty will certainly increase in the measure as the sun of enlightenment rises over the horizon of your vast and glorious country.

Dr. Mo kerjee's opinions on public affairs are so well known from the pages of Ren and Rayyer, that it is hardly necessary to quote solated ref rences. One or two may, however, find a place. In February, 1891, writing of the Age of Consent agitation he

And what was the harm in principle or in if they did something special in the way of legislation and attout? Salve republicat suprema lex. That is exactly what this and politicians are apt to forget. I respect law; and justice I reverence above everything, but we should beware of making tenshes of these and paying them blind adolation. Great as law is, my friend, and greater as justice; existence is above them all. You are profoundly ignorant of where you are. You are sleeping in the criter of a volcano. Government have already wasted much valuable time. They listened to your Bengal politicians who would lay the evil of Discord by holding brotherly meetings of Hindus and Moslems, and so forth. They would not needings of rindus and mostems, and so forth. They would not take our stronger counsel; they were afraid of you and your finerds—the parliamentary badgers. But their policy of peace-at-any price only incouraged the spirit of lawlessness, and riot upon not at last opened their eyes, and they decided to act with firmness. The effect cannot now be the same as before, specially if they adopt half measures as if they were Willing to wound and vet afraid to strike.

These are difficult matters, and I am not surprised that, in default of special knowledge of the situation, you should be at sex. What surprises me is your talk on the cow-question, your protessation of toleration, &c., all ending in the remark that the riots have been caused by the action of the officials unduly favouring the heen caused by the action of the officials unduly favouring the Mahomedans. But it is uscless to argue with one who at this hour says, 'a little rowdyism is needed.' It is a relief to know that you are no official. But then you would have talked differently, perhaps gone to the other pole. You are still young, Kisari, and it may befit you to b' bellicose. I am past the years of recklessness and am for peace. War, even in my time, is not so horrible to contemplate from a safe distance at home. But I have no wit to see the fun of war within my own country, and between our own people, and I pray to God to avert such a calamity from us."

For much more that is well worth reading we must refer readers to the volume itself. Intrinsically it is a book worth buying and reading, and it may also be noted that the profits of the puband reading, and it may also be noted that the profits of the punlication go to the family of Dr. Mookerjee, who were not left too well provided for. It is hoped that a second edition may be called for, and having that in view we would suggest a careful rereading for "literals" which will be found on the first page of the Dedication, and here and there through ut the book. On page 160 we should query the word "idiotisms;" probably Dr. Moo-kerjee wrote "idioms." The full and useful index---Mr. Skrine in the course of his reading has marked and taken to heart Carlyle's recommendation --- should be transferred to the close of the book,

A FEW INCHES OF PLAIN ENGLISH.

A FEW INCHES OF PLAIN ENGLISH.

NOWADAYS men are doing all sorts of wonders by means of electricity, both in mechanics and in chemistry. Tsee by the papers that they expect to be able to produce real diamonds by it. Perhaps they may in invelse over cross. But we will wait till they do before we crow over the job. Up to this time, answay, everything that is both valuable and useful is the fund of hird work. Even diamonds are mostly got out of rocky mines. Aid, within reasonable limit, it is good for us to have to work. Ten shirlings honestly cained is better for a mo than twenty in the shape of a legacy.

The best condition of things for any country would be when fair wages could be earned straight along, without loss or deduction for any reason. But in the present aspect of himman affine this is impossible. Whose fails it is we cannot may discuss.

One source of loss, however, is plain enough, and some remedy for it mages could be earned straight along, without loss or deduction for any reason. But in the present aspect of human affairs this is impossible. Whose fault it is we cannot move distines.

One source of loss, however, is plant enough, and some remedy for it ought to be found. In England and Wiles every working man averages ten days of thoress per year, in king the total loss of wages from this cause about fi6,000 000 c vear. We are taking of the average, you see. But measure as all working-men are not ill every year, this everage does not fauly show the soff-ring and loss of those who are di. In any given year many will lose no time at all, while others may lose individually from ten days to six months each. No chairly, no savings, no income from clobs, &c., can make up for this—even in movey alone to sav nothing of the pain and the misery.

Alliading to an experience of his in 1888 Mr. George Lagdon says, "I had to give up my work," How this came to pass he tells us in a letter dated from his hone in White House Road, Sichbing, near Dummow, Angus 24, 1892. Ho had no inherited disease or weakness, so far as he knew and was always strong and well up to April of that year—1888. Then his strength and energy began to leave him. He felt tred, not as from work, but as from power gone out of him through some boddy failure. He sat down to his meals, but not with his old eage ness and relish. There was a navy copper-like Laste in his mount, his teeth and toughe were covered with slime, and his throat elagged with a kind of thick phighn, difficult to "hawkinp" and eject.

He also speaks of a nagging pin in the stomach, fithlency, and much palpitation of the heart as having been acound his symptoms. As the aimmin whatever it was—progressed he began to have a hacking cough which, he says, seemed as if it must shake him to process. He could scarcely sleep on account of it. One of the most aluming features of his illness, however, were the night weaking to happen and the was consumptive, and it and individually happen and pile or work with—hands, brains, or both.

Is it necessary to draw a "moral"—school-book style—from these facts? No, it is not. We have talked plain English, and that is

OPINION OF THE PRESS

OPINION OF THE PRESS

Mookerjee's letters are matvels of pure diction which is heightened by his oervous style... The life has been told by Mr. Skime in a very pleasant manner and which should make it popular not only with all those who are able to appreciate ment immarted by ostentation, and emisenties mispoiled or barshness.—The Muhammadan, Oct. 5, 1895

We may at any rate condully agree with Mr. Skime that the study of Mookerjee's life, and that lits lights and shadows, is pregnant with all its lights and shadows, is pregnant with lessons for those who desire to know the real findia... A man of large heart and great qualities, his death from puremiona in the early spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian jumination, and it was an adminable idea on Mr. Skime's part to put his Life and Letters upon record—The Time of India, September 30, 1895 nis Life and Letters upon record — The Times of India, September 30, 1895.

The late Editor of Reis and Rayyet was a profound student and an accomplished witter, who has left his mark on Indian pontualism. In that he has found a Civilian bke Mi-Skitne to record the story of his life he is more fortonate than the great Kivisudas Palhimself....The Tribune, October 2, 1895.

It is raiely that the life of an Indian journal ast becomes worthy of publication; it is more raiely still that such a life comes to be written by an Anglo-Indian and a member of the Indian Civil Service. But, it has come to pass that in the lamb of the Bengali Babus, the life of at least one man among Indian pointailists has been considered worthy of being written by an Englishman The Madras Standard, September 30, 1895.

THE SUNYASSEE. BY JAMES HUTCHINSON. (Continued from p. 470.) CANTO SECOND.

A scorned them then I my haughty heart Could well, with their unkindness cope ; And still, that sweet delusion hope, Though fading, would not all depart, And these were stirring times, for men, Who knew the art, to welld a blide, And trust me, such will come again; But I may, then, he lowly laid, Oh l🏶 forgot my altered state, Dreaming of times, when all elate, And youthful blood was mentling warm, I sought to test a stripling's arm.

I took my sabre, in my hand, My good shield, at my back, was slung, * My turban red, in many a band, And twist, was round my temples wring; I girt my loins, and took my way, † Shall cause had I, to grieve to part, And less to dread, from robber fray, My purse was lighter, than my heart; But my good arm was stout, and strong, No longer terrible seemed death, And for the right, -peak ps the wrong, I thus might traffic, with my breath, For what, I valued then,—a name,—. Nor dreamt, what seemed a noble, and Might end, in little less, than shame. The time seemed fit; for still, there stood Some remnants of our princely blood; And still, my country's banners waved, Tho' she herself was half enslaved; And in my pride, I thought to try My maiden blade, in cause so high.

Ш.

That Hydra vast, the English power, Was then, but in its infancy, But those, who knew, foresnw an hour, If still unchecked, when it would be More fatal to our liberty ; Already Tippoo overthrown, * What state, with them, could cope, alone? Moslem he was !- yet he did well, Even, in the threshold, where he feld. Of his own fort, and capital ; Even as Rajpoot might wish to fall. So fell he, and when some low hind, That should have stopped, his wounds to bind, Would stup the Baldric, from his side, All crimsoned, with life's purple tide. With dying hand, he seized his glaive, And meet reward he dealt the slave. Or sought to deal, for he was low. And weak the arm, that sped the blow. The gallant act bath cost his life : A bullet closed the, unequal strife ; And there, mid heaps of slain, he lay, Till life, and rule had passed away, And foreign standards finated o'er Each bastion, battlement and tower ! Yes! I will all forget his creed. Even, for that last, and bravest deed ; His hatred of the English name, And for my failing country's fame, Oh! that her chiefs had, but, forseen The tide of change, that since both been ; Then had they scorned the policy, In hour of need, that spurned his call; Aye I cursed the bild jealousy, That sought to profit by his fall.

*Tippoo Sooltan, the son of Hyder Alee, and sovereign of the independent state of Mysore was overthrown by the British Government, during the administration of the Marquess of Wellesley. In the assault and capture of the Fort of Seringapatam, on the 4th of May 1799, Tippoo was killed, as described in the text, and the sovereignty of Mysore passed from his family. His descendants still reside under surveillance, at Russub, near Calcutta.

This description is quite consistent with the manners of the East.

The equipment, described in the text, is the common one, for a person on foot; the hoiseman occasionally carries the spenr and shield, or these two along with the sabre.

To gird the loins is a very common phrase in Scripture, which is in hourly use, and is as often fulfilled in India. The kommur-band or girdle is there worn hy all the nagives; it is generally taken off, when they wish to be at ease, and is sain had recourse to, when duty or labour calls. To appear without it, or the turban, or with the shoes on before a person of any consequence, is considered to be a great mark of disrespect offered.

WEEKLYANA.

LAST week we completed the first part of The Sunyassee. To-day we begin the second canto. The disappointed lover turns a patriot, prates on the past glory of India and her future greatness and girds himself up to free the country from the Franks. The author of the poem was a surgeon on the Bengal Establishment, Secretary to the Medical Board of the Presidency, and Private Secretary to the Honourable the President of the Council in India. The year of the poem is 1837 and it was composed in the Cape of Good Hope where the author, after an uninterrupted residence of nearly seventeen years in India, had gone to seek renewed health. He says in the preface that " the historical sketch embodied in the Poem, is strictly in accordance with what are considered the most authentic records of the times, and I have the opinion of a very competent person, for believing, that the plan of the Poem is natural, with reference to that portion of India, in which the scene is laid; and that the transition of an impetuous young man, from an unfortunate lover, to a warrior, a free-booter, and an ascetic, is in accordance, with the contingencies of fortune, in the East." The picture is substantially as true in 1895 as it was in 1837, with this difference that the Indian Continent being now disarmed by law, there is no more the patriot's call to arms, but the patriotism of the day is confined chiefly to preaching of Hinduism for the regeneration of India.

A SUBURBAN " independent weekly of Politics, Literature, and Art," with guaranteed circulation of over 7,000 copies weekly, edited by a Graduate, couples the Christmas of the Christians and the Doorga Puja of the Hindus of Bengal with the Muhurrum of the Mahomedans. The journal is truly independent-making no distinction between birth and death, joy and sorrow.

MRS. Langtry has been robbed of jewels valued, according to the bills paid, at 40,000/. While leaving England for Baden-Baden, she, as is her want, deposited a tin box containing most of her ewellery at the Sloane Street Branch of the Umon Bank. During her absence a stranger took delivery of the box on an order purporting to be train her to the Bank. On her return she was surprised to learn that the box was not in the Bank being removed in her name. A reward of 500l, has been offered for recovery of the jewels.

A DARING day robbery in the streets of London is reported.

"Just before seven o'clock in the morning of September 25, the train from Wales brought to London five cases of togot silver, consigned by Messrs. Vivian and Co., Syonsea, to Messrs. Sharp and Wilkins, Winchester Street, London Will. It appears that it is not de facto, the nead of the Minacatta Government.

The circumstance, allided to in the poem, is that of the Peishwah hoving made an ultiance with the British Government, during the administration of the Marquess of Wellesley, by which he entrusted the defence of his kingdom to the English, while he retained the Civil Government in his own bands. In the Pindariee war of 1817 the last Peishwah was defeated at Mahupore, and subsequently surrendered himself up; he now remains a state prisoner, on a handsome allowance, at Butour near Cawipore.

an unusual thing for these ingots to be transferred from the works at Swansea to London, and his frequently come twice a week. The ingots stolen—thirty-one in number—were enclosed in five large cases. Each case was composed of heavy timber, bound with iron bands, and the openings were secured by screw bolts. The ingots of silver were shaped like a river punt, with a flat top measuring in length 15½ inches, while the ends and sides being cut off an an angle left the bottom to inches in length. Each ingot was 5 inches wide at the top and 4 inches deep, and on the bottom of each ingot were the initials 'V and S.,' together with a number. The numbers ranged consecutively from 556 upwards. The ingots varied in weight from 947 oz. to 1,271 oz., the total weight being 34,984 oz., valued at 4,800l. When the five cases arrived at St. Pancras, they were, as isual, entrusted to the driver of a waggoo who was accustomed to convey them to their destination. At seven o'clock the van-driver, with his boy, left the Midland depot with his valuable load for London Wall. Scarcely had he left the station when, according to his statement, he pulled up at one of the many coffee-houses which exist for the convenience of carmen in the neighbourhood of Phœnix Street and Ossulton Street. According to the statements to hand the carman and his boy were inside the coffee-house for a space of twenty minutes partaking of their breakfast. When they energed into Ossulton Street they found cording to the statements to hand the carman and his boy were inside the coffee-house for a space of twenty minutes partaking of their breakfast. When they emerged into Ossulton Street they found that the van and its contents had disappeared."

HERE is an American parson's parting benediction to his flock :-

"Brothers and sisters, I come to say gnod-by. I don't think God loves this clurch, because none of you ever die. I don't think god love each other, because none of you ever die. I don't think you love each other, because I never marry any of you. I don't think you love each other, because I never marry any of you. I don't think you love me because you have not paid my salary; your donations are mostly fruit and wormy apples; and 'by their fruit ye shall know them.' Brothers, I am going away to a better place. I have been called to be chaplain of a penitentiary. Where I go ye cannot come, but I go to prepaie a place for you, and may the Lord have mercy on your souls. Good-by."

The Medical Annual for 1895, speaking of Hydrophobia, says that "Diller, in an exceedingly interesting report upon this disease, in which he gives statistics in regard to seventy-eight cases, is of the opininn that many of the so-called cases are 'utterly incredible and wholly spurious. He deplores the popular agitation which has attended the establishment of so-called 'Pasteur Institutes,' which have undoubtedly led to the increase of hystero-epilepsy both in this country and France, and lays little reliance upon the statistics of the ardent supporters of the founder of the inoculation cure and his

THE Monthly Magazine of Pharmacy has the following remarks:

"The celebrated Professor Von Pettenkofer, who a short time ago, when seventy-four years of age, swallowed the celebrated commubacillus of Koch (the cholera-bacillus) in presence of many eminent bacillus of Koch (the cholera-bacillus) in presence of many einment witnesses, and without interfering much with his general health (though he has suffered from glycosirra for years), has dealt a severe blow to the germ theory of disease, and he has now, in Germany, a large number of followers. He does not deny that germs (bacteria) may be a factor in disease, which he calls x, but there is another factor, x, which is individual idiosyncrasy, and yet a third, y, which still remains to be determined, and the latter is the cause of epidemics. The latter attack certain districts where y exists, quite independently of x and x, and bespect other districts where y is absent. The x y z theory of Dr. Yon Pettenkofer is now attroffing much attention, and it is believed that when the real nature of its discovered, it will be in our power to prevent epidemics of all kinds. The determination of y is the great medical problem of the present day."

HERE is a cure for cholera. A correspondent writes to a Bombay

"In view of the telegrain from St. Petersburg respecting the outbreak of cholera in that cuty it may be useful to mention that a very simple specific for that disease exists, although I have reason to think it is known to few. If the sufferer is given strong pure coffee in the early stages of the symptoms I believe it to be an unfailing remedy. I must emphasize the necessity of its being both strong and absolutely pure. Add to about meethed of a cup of coffee two-thirds of boiling water, and drink as soon as sufficiently cool to take with a spoon, repeating the dase several times, and the cramp together with the pains in the abdonein will be found to gradually subside. The action of the coffee seems to be that of clearing the stomach and intestines of the cholera phison; and at the same time is mildly stimulating. I have several times tried this remedy in England and once recently in Bombay with marked sincress in every case. I may add that during the cholera epidemic at Hamburg a few years ago it was successfully administered in hundreds of cases, and it is worthy of remark that while the doctors niterly failed in their ende evours to grapple with the dead disease by means of drugging, in no single mistance did pure coffee fail to effect a core."

^{*} Formerly the Peishwah was the head of the Mharattah empire, a confederacy not very dissimilar to that, which long existed in Europe, under the name of the German Empire. The name signifies Europe, under the name of the German Empire. The name signifies minister, and such, the Peishwohis originally were of the Rajah Sattarah; His Highness however prided howelf more, in being the spiritual head of the Empire, and the consequence was, that his house fell into comparative misgnificance, and that the Peshwahs became de facto, the head of the Mharatta Government.

CANCEROUS tumours are not infrequent in India. A cure of such a growth by belladonna is thus reported by Doctor Wingfield, in Monthly Review.

"Bellulona and Cancer.—A woman, aged fifty, with a swelling in the right breast, which had been noticed for six months and was increasing in size, applied at the Brominglium Hospital. The tumour was hard but moveable, situated below the nipple, which was numistably retracted. Glands not enlarged, but much pain down right ann. It was devided the growth was cancerons, and that the breast should be removed. Preparatory to the operation, Belladonia was ordered internally, and, strange to say, in a fortright's time all symptoms had disappeared and no trace of the tumour was to be discovered."

An American medical journal says :-

"A correspondent of the New York Medical Times speaks very disparagingly of the clinical thermometer, a circumstance that brings to mind the fact that in Joseph Price's hospital in Philadelphia the thermometer is never used

It is noticious that this instrument is often a factur for evil—that too many practitioners to eat the thermometer instead of the patient."

Very true, Yanng or hasty practitioners pay much heed to the clinical hermometer. Fac very maid-servants of respectable families in and about Calcutta speak of fevers as registering so many degrees of hent above the normal temperature. The patient, his relatives and friends are alarmed by the family physician telling them the readings of the thermometer when, in fact, the fever is not at all dangerous.

THE following Song of the General Practitioner by Dr. J. Johnston, was sung at the annual dinner of a Medical Society in the U. S., A. Some of the inconveniences of the profession have been happily but by the writer.

"He must not walk his rounds for fear his patients think him poor, And dearly do they love to see a carriage at their door; And if his horse is fat, 'He must have little work to do,' And if his lean, the reason is, 'He stores the poor old screw.'

Should be call upon his patients every day when they are ill, His motive plainly is, ' to make a great big doctor's bill '; If he visits them less frequently—thus lessening their expense—The chances are he'll be accused of wilful negligence.

He must work all day and half the night, and never say he's tired. For the public look upon him simply as a servant hired. And should be take a hollday, he'll find, when he comes back, Some patients have resented it by giving him 'the sack.'

Concerning money, he must seem indifferent to be,
And falks will think he practices from pure philanthropy.
When we hear about him boasting of the guineas that he earns,
We wonder if they all appear in his income-tax returns.

About his own afflictions he must never say a word;
The notion of a doctor being fill is so absurd!
And when, perhaps from overwork, he's laid upon the shelf,
His sympathizing patients say, 'Physician, heal thyself?'

THE Madras High Court has held that a bicycle is a vehicle with springs, and as such tax ible by the Municipality. We may now see a revival of the attempt to tax such conveyances in Calcutta. The Calcutta Municipal Aci defines a " carriage," on which a tax is imposable, as any wheeled vehicle with springs used for the conveyance of human beings, and ordinarily drawn by an animal," any of the wheels exceeding twenty-four inches in diameter.

THE following note, extracted from the North Carolina Medical Journal of September 1895, on bicycle riding has equal interest in India where such riding is rapidly becoming general,

"This made of lacomotion, which was started a few years ago as a "This mode of lacomotion, which was stated a few years ago as a pure and simple sport, has been rapidly developed into a necessity to the public—not that we could not do without the hicycle, for as we did without it once, so we can again—but it is a necessity in the same sense as the telephone and other such inventions. From the old-time buggy-wheel affair, with its waoden spokes and from tire, which ratified down the streets like a nun-a-way express wagon, the wheel has passed through the several stages of evolution until it has attained the high degree of perfection we see in the modern spider-web wheel, with its ball bentings and poeumatic tires, which enable the rider to spin along at a rate of twelve or three miles an hour without jar or noise had with a minimum of exection.

Is it any, wonder that the despe to mount the silent steed has swept and conditions of people? The old man and the matron, the voting and conditions of people? I note that and the marcon, the young man and the maid, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the professional man and the laborer, the healthy and the sick, we see them all spinning along the streets and boulevards of the city and along the pikes and bypaths of the cural districts, casting aside all care and worry, drinking in the life-giving oxygen, their faces radiant with pleasure, as they enjoy what may well be called the poetry of Numerous articles have appeared from time to time in the and lay papers, some of which seem to us to have been written from a prejudiced standpoint. In view of the wonderful popularity of the wheel, it is but right that its effects on the people should be considered. How will it affect the health and the murals of those sidered. How will it affect the health and the mirals of those who inde? As physicans we are hound to give attention to the former. It is the tendency of modern civilization to exercise the brain and not the body. The business man brards a crowded car and rides to his office, where he keeps himself confined until it is time to leave for home; the women pass days at a time in ill-ventilated houses, the atmosphere of which is contaminated by sewer gas, and when they do go out wisp themselves in furs and ride in close carriage, if it be winter, and imagine they are taking exercise! With such sedentary habits is it any wonder that nervous and digestive traubles are so common? Men voir symmasiums and women physical cultime if it be winter, and imagine they are taking exercise! With such sedentary habits is it any wonder that nervous and digestive troubles are so common? Men join gynnasiums and winten physical culture classes, but they soon look upon this as no it-knune duty and abandon it. Walking has but little attraction. Something is needed to draw these people into the open air, and from personal experience we know of no finm of exercise so gentle, so noiversal and so peculiarly attractive as bicycling. The opposers of the exercise may be answered, we feel convinced, by the assertion that it is the abuse, and not the use, of the breycle which causes injury. The person who wishes to ride should find out from some one qualified to judge, what would be the abuse of the wheel in his particular case, and then should awoud that abuse. The extreme stroped position is an abuse with all riders, and is nunceersary even in hill-climbing. All speed of over eight miles an hour usay be an abuse with mer rider, while affects nucle gat may not be with another. One may safely ride twenty-five or thirty miles, while another should not ride more than five or six, or even two, without resting. Each rider must have rules for hinself. It would be an abuse of the wheel far some persons to attempt to ride at all. Let the breycle be ridden as it should be and it will do guad to the healty and to the invalid.

There is no muse reason against a wongay's ridual sheeds than and to the invalid.

and to the invalid.

There is no more reason against a woman's riding a blcycle than against her swimining. From an anatomical standpoint, it would be better adapted to women than to men. From the standpoint of experience there is every reason for her indiging in the sport. Dr. Charles R. Townsend has studied the effect of the bicycle upon women based upon the experience and statements of eighteen lady rulers and physicians. His conclusions are 'that bicycling is heneful to the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycle upon the effect of the bicycling is heneful to the bicycling is heneful to the bicycling is heneful to the bicycling is heneful to the bicycling is heneful to the bicyc within the conditions are that breyeing is neu-ficial to women, not from any special effect upon the pelist organs, but because it is an agreeable, healthful form of exercise in the open air, a furm which exercises the whole body, and indirectly benefits special conditions. And the converse of this holds true, that, as a general exercise, they hing is not harful to the nelvic migans, even when these are affected, unless the disease is so acute that any exercise as great as this is continuindicated."

At the present day, woman being equal to man, any exercise devised for him becomes her as well

BEFORE the citizens of Calcutta have heard the last of the mission in the native quarter, another tragedy of double violent deaths has convulsed the commercial portion of the city | Last Thursday evening two not very well attended fineral processions forming one passed b this office. The hearses contained coffins covering the remains two intimate friends-Mr. W. Collingwood, aged 32, master pilot, an Mr. J. G. Pugh, aged 25, of Messis, Massey and Pugh, jute broket and Messrs. Pugh, Schollay & Co., Ld., jute bailers. The first was married man with a wife, the other was a bachelor but of pectably connected. Formerly the two friends lived together at Com-Street. Recently they removed to the top flat of the Commercia Buildings, No. 3, in the first floor of which Messrs, Pugh have the office. Mrs. Collingwood with her cousin Miss. Palmer occupie one room, the two dead occupying another. On Wednesday, after office. Mr. Pugh, as usual, went out on a walk accompanied by his dis There was no indication that anything unusual was the matter wi him. Then, as was their wont, the family of Mo. Collingwood and M Pagh dired together and, so far as is known, nothing happened then ! disturb the even tenour of their apparently happy lives. The only indent happening in the interval of the walk and the dinner, if it i any way led to the tragedy that was reserved till after the diane was the despatch of a letter from Theatre Road to the addreaccording to one account, of Mrs. Collingwood, and according another, of Mr. Pugh. Shortly after ten o'click both the friends well dead-one at the verandah and the other at the room. Both at weltering in blood, the deaths being violent. There is no mismel tion that a stranger to the house had done the bloody deed ? suspicion rests on any of the servants. The friends must have con ver tife hand like a great tidal wave until it has seized upon all classes by their deaths between themselves. The head of the cliffs smassed-apparently with a damb-bell that lay close by covered with blood, and the younger had shot himself dead. The presumption is that Pugh killed Collingwood and then killed himself. But why? That is a mystery which is not likely to be solved.

On the report of the gine or the report of her ayab, Mrs. Collingwood came out of her room, and, finding her husband and her friend weltering in blood, presumably dead, ordered the garry and drove down to 8, Middleton Street, to Mr. Massey, her friend's partner in the jute brokers' business. She is evidently not on friendly terms with the other families living on the same flat, or perhaps could not, in the excitement of the moment, think of calling in any other aid, medical or other, near at hand. She semembered Mr. Mussey as the best man to whom he could apply for advice and assistance. Mr. Massey came, saw and-informed the Police, at about midnight. The police enquiry elicited little to account for the deaths. The neighbours had no information to give and the native servants of a European household in matters of this kind are absolutely useless. The bodies were removed for post mortem examination. The coroner's inquest has not concluded.

Infimate in life, the two friends are intimate in death. Both died together, both were given Christian hurial in the same cemetery in the Circular Road, they were had side by side, the same priest prayed for the peace of their souls.

No further seek their merits to disclose, Or draw their frailties from their dread abade. (There they alike in trembling hope repose,) The bosom of their Fither and their God.

A NATIVE is a native. He may be a superior in office to a European as the term is understood in India, still the Native must be subordinate to the European. A European servant in a native household or business establishment has precedence given him by the native servants over the head of their employer. Such is British prestige in India. No wonder, therefore, that in the daily Police reports in the morning papers, the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Ameer Hossem, C. I E., the Chief Magistrate, has the second place, the first being reserved for Mr. Binnand, the other supendiary magistráte.

THE bearer of the well-known untials "G. A. S.," the famous George Augustus Sala, one of the greatest living masters of the English language, is extremely ill. We fear much his pecuniary affairs have made him so and stand in the way of his quick recovery He is largely involved and his creditors are upon him. A pension of £100 a year from the Civil List has been granted him and there is a remour that the Daily Telegraph has pensioned him off with a thousand a year. Without being burdened with a large family, having only himself and his wife to maintain, and without being a book-sellers' back, it is a surprise that he should be in such a predicament. Probably he lived beyond his income, and the journal hearing his name, we are told, has landed him in difficulties. Major Evans B II, almost similarly circumstanced, died of poverty, for no help came when he needed it most. We hope no such fate aw ms Mr. Sala.,

A DIET OF INDIAN NATIVE PRINCES THE control of the East India Association having passed to the conductors of the "Imperial and Asigue Quarterly Review and Oriental and Colonial Record. the Society has now no separate journal of its Swn. The proceedings of that body, however, occasionally find their way to the Quarterly. Its last number, that of October, gives the minutes of a meeting of the Association held, under the presidency of the Earl of Cranbroook, a Past Secretary of State Earl of Cranbroook, a rast Secretary of State for India, on the 11th July, in the Westrinster Town Hall. It also publishes the paper read on that occasion by Sir Roper Lethbridge on on that occasion by Si Isoper Dealine is on "The Sovereign Princes of India and their relation to the Empire." The subject is welcome to every Indian who has the good of his country at he art and Indian who has the good or ins country at mart and the managers of the Quarterly have taken particular care, for which our thanks are due to make the lecture widely known. Coming and return the authors of Protected Princes of India and Our Indian Protectorate, the claim of Sir Roper to speak on the subject may be doubted. As one who has seen service in India and been attached to the Foreign Department of the Gove Commissioner, as authors as Press Book of India, and as one whi or India is growing every day, Sir R deserving can revive the usefulness of the East India Association and preserve its integrity, he will have done a service to that body and the country with which it is associated.

The lecturer bases his paper on the declaration made by Lord Salisbury in 1866 when, as Lord Cranborne and member for Stamford, he addressed his constiuents on his appointment as Secretary of State for

sinen of all Parties have arrived at the conclusion that we in India pretty well as much as we can govern, and that d be pursuing an unwise and dangerous policy if we tried our borders, or to lessen the power or the permanence Native Rulers upon whose assistance we have so long re-chieve the Native Princes were formerly the objects of and distrust to English rulers, but within the last ten reat change has come over the spirit of our statesmanship freet change has come over the spirit of our statesmanship spect; and there is now, I think, a general desire to m in the rights and honours which they justly carned loval support at the time of the Mutin, and to look en, not as impediments to our rule, but as its most holicy so enunciated by the present Premier, a century ago, in development of the ship exhibited by Sir Charles Wood and ning, has, Sir Roper believes, been acted accessive Secretaries of State and Viceroys, on that, in 1860. "sanctioned the retrocession on that, in 1860, "sanctioned the retrocession Nizam of two important provinces of the rabad Assigned Districts," permitted, in 1877, endfaion of Mysore. The same policy was d by Laid Northbrook in the case of the late Rao of Baroda, and Lord Lansdowne had e policy in view in the Manipur business. In and others, there has been no departure from laid down. If then, the action of the Govern-India has sometimes seemed to be harsh, the call ways been excellent—"in the great major, perhaps all, the best practical arrangement the circumstances has been arrived at." Fr also admits the soundness of Sir II. es policy not to publish the proceedings the esuspension or deposition of a Protected n the matter of the Maharaja of Bhurthowever doubts whether such a system or one, for it has its disadvantages. It is agueness and the evils attending it, which ites: He wants therefore a clear, defined inay be tempted to ask, if he has found ong why should he be anxious for a stive States? His answer is that future ors may go wrong. How then to protect ? Als recommendation is to revive the colicy of Lord Lytton. To it "we must be consolidation and perfection of the In-

1 15 tem." He says:

The says:

The says:

The says is the Imperial Council, which ought to and spontaneous-up the one direction, and the highest radge for appealaries on the says of the highest radge for appealaries. the Imperial Council, which ought to yard spot taneous--in the one direction, it of the highest value for consultative, and gridative purposes and in the other directional Committee, into a grand judicial lamines. I suppose that that Council still the of the preatest of the Sovereign and the title of the Sovereign that the title of the Sovereign that the title of the Sovereign that the title of the Sovereign that the title of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the sole of the Sovereign that the sole of the sole pred the title of Councillo, of the Emfar as one can judge from the public c been allowed to fall entirely into abev-ill more to be regretted is, that the wav signalised their willingness to be most personal relations with the Empire, entiments were thus reciprocated and the have consequently never really regnity and consideratio which was un rue to them.

and that it would ultimately include, not only the great Princes of India, but also the heads of the British Indian Government. And if such an august body had been strengthened on its juderal side--much as the House of Lords is strengthened by the Law side--much as the House of Lords is strengthened by the Law Lords--by the addition of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Courts, it was thought by many that it would form an ideal tribunal, admirably qualified to deal, by the machinery of Committees, with every case of difficulty arising between the Empire and the Sovereign Princes, or between the Princes themselves, or between them and their subjects. I do not wish for a moment to be understood to say that all these developments were within the purview of Lord Lytton's intentions; for I do not know that it was so, though I believe it. But it is obvious were within the purview of Lord Lytton's intentions; for I do not know that it was so, though I believe it. But it is obvious that they might have fairly and rasonably arisen out of the measures adopted by that Vicerov; and my desire this afternoon is to advocate the taking up again of Lord Lytton's liberal Imperial policy of 1877, with a view of carrying it to its legitimate conclusion. Of one thing I am quite sure, that Lord Lytton's warmly sympathetic and generous nature of which I knew much both as a friend and as a subordinate, would never have rested content with the present chans which is a substitute to the have rested content with the present chaos which is as unfair to the Princes as it must be occasionally distressing to every high-minuded Viceroy and Secretary of State."

The suggestion is no doubt good, at any rate, intended to do good. It affords a tribunal for justice to our Princes who are not unoften punished for no offence of their own, who are kept out of their rights by intrigues and false reports, and condemned unheard. But will it be accepted? In the rial of Mulhar Rao, Lord Northbrook ventured on such an experiment. It has not been repeated. Several years ago Lord Stanley of Alderley tried but failed to get an Appeal Court composed of High Court Judges appointed to try cases like, say, the Chamba succession. If such a Court existed, Suchait Singh, the rightful ruler, would not be dragging a miserable existence in England where he had gone for justice. He was kept out on a false statement of his relation with the Raja he was to have succeeded. One baste-born was put on the guddee to extinguish the claim of the legal and. The deceiving report was corrected three wicks later as a chilical error, after the trick had succeeded. The attention of the Duke of Argyll was drawn to it, but the order having been passed, it must stand, though the heavens fall. The troubles of Suchait are never to end. That they may continue, he is subjected to another similar trick. To shew up the injustice done him, an attempt has been made, by those who wish well of him, to make him a bankrupt. There is a counter-movement, by those interested in suppressing facts, to stifle the enquiry. The too simple Suchait, playing into the hands of those whom he should avoid, resists the action taken in his interest.

The question revived by Sir Roper is not a simple one. Whether it is desirable to have an Imperial Council or not, the Protected Princes certainly require protection from Politicals who make or mar them in the dark. If secrecy has its advantages, the demoralization in its train perhaps outweighs them. The Princes are perfectly helpless. Born in the purple, they have no rights of citizens. They cannot claim the justice that her Majesty's ordinary subjects may have. Whatever their position under the paramountey of the British Power in India, the ruling princes contribute largely to the Imperial ism of the Empire and deserve better treatment.

There was a discussion on the paper after it was read. We will conclude this notice of the lecture by reproducing the closing words of the Chairman of the meeting :-

time it was very commonly expected which has been assigned to me by my friends, Sir Roper Lethrow into an Indian analogue, on a bridge and Sir Owen Burne. Of the many manners in which cere was none of the many manners in which cere was none.

which interested me so much as the India Office when I was there and I am glad to have the testimony of the various gentlemen to the able character of my friend, Lord Lytton. So far as I am concerned, I can safely say I do not recall any occasion on which I differed from the conclusions arrived at by Lord Lytten. His mind was very much occupied in binging out the higner class in India, both in rule and in intelligence. For the Government of India, his desire was that there should be intimate relations between the Princes and the Paramount Power and to bring into harmonious action those two powers. The progress going on in India is not only in civilization, but in the knowledge and science of the West.

I know that this meeting is important, because it has given expression to that which is in the minds of men at present; that is, not union by violence but union by harmony of thought. In India there is beginning to be that Imperial interchange of strength and Sir Lepel Griffin mentioned the case of one young ruler who is in thorough sympathy with the Government and determined to help them by every means in his power.

The analogy of Germany requires some reconsideration. Germany was brought together not as a congenes of nations, but as one nation. There is almost as great a difference in India between the different nations as between Europeans and Asiatics and the German system therefore, could not be applied to India at all. Germans were brought together because they were one in kindred, language and thought; there might be some differ ences among them as to religion, etc.; bit they were all Germans. When you come to India you find something quite different and I have continually said myself that this Imperial Conneil may be compared to the Privy Council. The Privy Council may England is largely an honorary distinction. When they are brought into Her Majesty's presence, they may be said to be Privy Councillors, but there are a great number of outside Councillors who are never called upon for their counsel. So it may be with regard to these Indian Councillors.

I wish every honour to be done to the Native Princes of India and I wish them to rule in their States beneficently, But I should have a long time to watt before I succeeded in combining the great and small in one muted scheme in which they allow ed others to legislate for their States. These things are matters of growth and cannot be forced. You have brought the English mind to take a deeper interest in India than it ever did before and I am delighted when I see these things discussed by men who know something about them. This discussion has been a set on with a vi w to the advonage of the Indian Princes People in this country think that growth is silently going on Ladia is one homogeneous, united nation. The English power has grown up against the will of England in one sense, because it iever contemplated the growth which has been thrust upon it It was done by means of pressure applied to an unwilling Gov Government of England street and it is essential that England should remain the Paramount Power and it is our imprest to combine those who are in immediate connexton with England with those who are in immediate connexion with India. I hope this question he fully discussed; but I do not believe that the man is yet born who has the wisdom or the power to lay down a Constitution Biltain is awaking to a sense of her responsibilities to for India. wards India and India may safely rely upon that It cannot be too much a subject for discussion in England, to see how we can bring about a closer umon."

"AN INDIAN JOURNALIST." (From the Muhimmidin, October 5, 1895.)

THE late Dr. Sambbu C Mookergee, Editor of Reis and Rayye, who died in Calcutta in February 1894, was a man who did good work during his time He has been fortunate in having a friengly biographer to tel, the story of his life and to preserve his lettings and corresponden c. The career of "An Indian Journalist" and described by F. H. Skime of the Indian Civil Service ly interesting. The work has apparently been a labour of live to the author, who feels almost a soft of affection for those qualities of kindness, generative, and independence of character which distinguished Mooferjee and made him beloved of all those who were intimately ac pointed with him. Brades being possessed of more of the milk of human kindness thin ordinary mortals loss more of the milk of human kindless than ordinary mortals, he owned abilities of no mean order which gained him the respect of some of the highest officials and the Iriendship of many eminent men. In his dedication of the work to Sir W. W. Hunter, Mr. Skrine says that Mooketjee was an instance of a Bengali with "backbone," and it was this backbone idded to a love of justice and fairplay and a disregard for the conventionalities of society, which in his case should have been all the more harassing as he came from a Brahmm stock of "the bluest of the blue," gives a charm to the pages of Mr. Skrine, and creates a sympathy in the reader with the struggles, the aspiratious and the literary work of this gifted Bengali. What we admire in him most is his earnestness coupled with his disregard of custom that fell foul of convenience. He was a Bohemian at heart and hence the mesistable fascination that journalism had for him from a very early age. It was his first love and he remained true to it up to the very end. If he had been more ambitious, more careful of the ways of the world, more eager to seek the attention, of the wealthy and the influential, he would certainly have been more bonoured and more rewarded. But it is this absence of the desire of appearing great and distinguished which adds to the desire of appearing great and distinguished which was so co-intrinsic value of the man and mikes to entertain a greater respect for his undoubted ratents. He took to postnalism because he loved it and he adhered to it throughout his life with of easional breaks. Though he played many parts in his life, he did not play Though he played many parts in his life he did them long enough to carn distinction in any of them, and his fame must rest upon his work as a journalist. We are glad that he has been saved from that oblivion which is the common jot of most journalists. Mr. Skone fully recognises this fact and he deserves the thanks of all the labourers in a held whose labour/ is not well

Phore is also a particular interest in the life of Dr. Mookerjee which lends additional value to the account given by Mr Skiine. Mookerjee came upon the scene at a very important period in the Bengal Born in 1839, he was about eightern years of age when the great mutiny broke out. The people in this country were just awakening under the Binish administration to a higher were just awakening under the British administration to a higher estimated of their own rights. The work of education had just in taken in hand, and the ambitton of many young men in agal when roused to do something worthy of themselves and of the land. The time was to ming with the promise of progress, tild those who were willing had the amount of the land. and that the were willing had the opportunity given them of inds the contact with the methods and a prople so different from their own. Men's made up for change hut what that change would be eatly be defined. Mookerjee, who, as we are told, was out fitty generations of ligh prests had all the tradical change to him, but he had an exceedingly individual was one of the first to olmst what an exceedingly in the European of the first to olmst what is the first to old what is the first to aluable service to the State Casto highe of the expressed therein he published a pamphlet for the special adople of England on the great mutiny, and though he opinion that that muting was brought about by in the British administration, he still was never slow duege be ulting power. His honesty and his fearlessness in this takes his character all the more noble as his position to difficulty. But if his position had been less encountered to the control of the conditions the distriction of the base and and which can be read in many of his yers.

His simplest was also great and his love of humanity was most noteworthy of a reading his life, we are reminded much of another and of lettern poor. Oliver Goldsmith, who tried his hand at many profession but who had to remain a bookseller's back to the end of his days. We notice the same intention of doing good and using frustrated. The same love of the good things of the world. The same kinds has towards his fellow men as well as towards the lower animals. The same desire for literary fame and nearly the same missioned in obtaining it. We believe what Mr. Skrine is a smaller those eyec had "the divine spark in him." Whether the life of the late Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerise would prove interesting, as Mr. Skrine says it would, no matter how midifferently winten, is not, perhaps, a practical question. The work before as Laves nothing to be desired either in the way of completeness, impartiality, or liftlike portrayal of character. The late editor of R_{CC} and R_{CO} every came, we learn, of the pures Brahmin stock, being thirt bouth in descent from Schaiss, the reported author of the last Indian epic Nuadb Charata. He in hirted his literary gift, therefore, through five centuries. "I must be about the," writes his biographer, "that the pursuits of Sunbhu Chunder's man diate progenitors, were hardly favourable to the conservation of hierary energy. Stern necessity had degraded them from the altar to the shop. His father, Mothur Mohim Mookeijee, far hom posing as a visible mainfestation of divinity, supported houself as a manufacturer and trader in the Cilcuita bazaar." Mr. Skime follows Mookeijee through all the Mr. Skime follows Mookerjee through all the vagaries and struggles of his early life. He was, it appears, wo only am, and therefore spoiled. After a short spell at the local Mission ary school his father removed him, through fear of his converse. to Christianity, and placed him at the Otiental Seminary at Garan hatta, where he speedily distinguished himself. He became an enthusiastic student, joining the Calcutta Public Lintary. "But," says Mr. Skrine, " the spectacle of a lad in los early teens reading with solemn elders had its ludicrous side. In order to escape the mild chaff' livished on him, he pored over his English classes while seated outside the Library in a pony carriage his father had provided to take him to school."

While at the Hindu Metropolitan College he started a periodical called the Calcuta Monthly Magazine, which soon came to gire!
Then he became for a short time editor of the Merning Chronicle, but a difference in political opinion between the editor and proprietor led to his resignation. He employed his enforced lessure in the composition of a pamphlet on the Muting, which created considerable sensation at home, and was generally voted too good to have been written by a Native. A short time previously, at the age of eighteen, he had married a member of re-Boral family of Jorasanko. The union was a happy one. In short time Mookerjee became attached to the staff of the Hos. Patriot, and became, as Mr. Strine insily save, "one of a littie knot of brilliant youths who held the bannet of Indian journalism higher than any of their successors have done." For two years he worked for this journal, and then deserted in for a short time to study law, but soon returned to his more congenial occupation, which he continued at for another three years. Subsequently he became Secretary to the Taluplais' Association of Oudh, and editor of the Samachar Hindustant, the organ of the Association. was appointed Dewan to the Nazim at Marshidibad, but was vailed there. A third spell at Hindoo Patentism was followed by an attempt at what Carlyle would call "schools mastering," but like that great man he found that teaching was not in his line. Subsequently he became Secretary to Raju Sheoraj Singh of Kashipur, and Minister to the Raja of Hill Tippera. Finally in 1882 he started his life work in Ren and Rayset, which he edited with vigour and success until his death from pine monta in 1894.

We have briefly outlined Mookery, 's career from the material which Mr. Skime has in his valuable work placed at our disposal, but it would be unjust to that work to judge of it from this epitome. Mr. Skrine deals with his interesting subject with the unfailing instinct of the biographer. Every side of Dr. Mookerjee's complex character is treated with sym, athy tempered by discinitnation. It would have been impossible, for example, for his biographer to hit upon a better method of bringing out the perpetual struggle which was going on between prejudice and liberalism in the mind of the enlightened Brahmin than by means of the instance

mentioned in the following passage

"His inherited prejudices were continually at war with these liberal impulses which were the growth of a life-long devotion to letters. Thus he was always ready to welcome those of his countrymen who had outraged unenlightened public opinion by crossing the seas, and he once advised a friend, who consulted him as to the readiest method of gaining notoriety, to visit Surope and take his wife with him. But after receiving a visit from one of the 'England returned' he always ordered the bookshi used during the call to be empited and cleaned, and everything polluted by his touch to be destroyed. In this struggle between inbred conviction and acquired culture the latter was, on the whole, victorious."

Mr. Skrine's narrative certainly impresses one with the indi-

OPINION ON THE BOOK.

1895.
Dr. Mankerjee was well worthy of the dis-Dr. monkelee was well worthly of the distinction accorded, so far as we know, to no other Native Journalist in India, of having an English Civilian for his biographer, but the honout is well in keeping with the life of its subject, who for many years enjoyed the presonal friendship of distinguished Civilians, of Provincial Governors, and of successive Viceroys. Mr. Skitne has performed his self-Viceroys. Mr. Skrine has performed his sen-imposed task in no paircoinsing manner, but in the spirit of one who while delighting to do to the spirit of one who while delighting to do of Provincial Governors, and of saccessive Viceroys. Mr. Skinie has performed his self-imposed task in an paironising manner, but in the spirit of one who while delighting to do honour to a great and good man does not lude his finibles. The subject of the biography was not free from faults, and Mr. Skinie does not attempt to make him appear otherwise.

It should not be fargotten that there are papers and papers and that as much difference exists between some of the rabid. Calcula points, and the paper which Dr. Mookelge founded as between darkness and light. Research Repyer has a ways been temarkable for the totogled ability, candour and chamablements of its criticisms, and the periodical has enjoyed a degree of influence approached by not other order weekly. The paper was so well managed by its founder as to attract general notice and bring him into confidential telations with the makers of history.

He was no mere sycophaat, and his friendship with men filling the exalted places of the land was due to no self-seeking endeavours to thinst limitelf upon them but to their own desire to become acquainted with a Native of great originality and personal chains.

Dr. Mujkerjee may be placed with the still lamented Justice Telang in the category of those natives of this country who are connecting links between rulers and ruled, and who by their labours, as well as by their personal example and influence, do immense service in welding together the diverse communities of the land in the boads of imperial brother-hond and lingally. The Bombay Guzette, Sentember 28, 1895.

For much of the biographical matter that issues so freely from the press an apology is needed. Had no hography of Dr. Mookerjee, the Editor of Reis and Rapyet, appeared, an explanation would have been looked for A main of his remarkable personality, who was easily first among institue Indian journalists, and in many respects occupied a higher plane than they did, and looked at public affurs from a different point of view from theirs, could not he suffe and his remarkable assumilation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mooker-per remained to the last a Brahman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his Brahmaos—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and approval. In consequence of this, his ideal biographer would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathles, and triunced like him in Western learning. If Bengal had produced such another man as Dr. Mooke-jee, it was he who should have written his life.

Mooke-jee, it was he who should have written his life.

The bingraphy is warmly appreciative without being needlessly landatory; it gives on the whole i complete pictine of the man; and in the book there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters addressed to Dr. Mooke-jee are of such minor importance that they might have been opitted with advantage, but not a word of its more letters could have been sparjed. To say that he writes idomante English is to any what is short of the trith. His diction is easy and correct, clear and straightforward, without Oriental luxinance or striving after effex. P shape he is never so clearning after effect. P those he is never so clearning as when he is Lyang down the laws of literature form, no young aspiratis to faute. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of critic sin; it is deligite plant-speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a would-be poet that his productions are not in the smallest degree paetry, without one may conclude, either offending the youth or remessing his ardaur.

For much more than is well worth rending we must refer readers in the volume itself. Intrinsically it is a book worth haying and reading.

The career of "An Initian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting.

Mindkeyee's letters are mirrels of pure diction which is heightened by his nervons style.

excellence of the biography.—The Bee, Oct. 12, 1895.

The book has a imique interest, being the memoir of a member of the subject race by a member of the ruling body; and as such, it ought to be widely read in every part of India, Dr. Monkerjee was one of the most talented and accomplished men this country has produced. It is impossible but to admire his hright intellect, his clisted diction, and his keen seuse of the humanious; and it is indeed fortunate that the Indian public should have a monograph, extibiting and setting out his a manograph, exhibiting and setting out his best qualities, from such an accomplished writer as Mr. Skrine—The Morning Post of India, October 15, 1895.

Our chieftams saw the peril nigh, And armed them, for the coming fight Scindiah and Bhonslah was the ciy* Of those, who knew the mystery ; But all, as yet, was veiled in night; At last the storm-cloud burst, and then, They met their enemies, like men, Who combat, for their country's cause Their native customs, and their laws, These might be right, or might be wrong, But then no arm should interpose, If foreign, that however strong, To bring inglorious repose. They fought, but fought, alas, in vain, To free them, from the galling chain, That coiled around them, like a snake ; Vain was the effort, vain the hope, As well, might they have tried to cope With fate, -as Wellesley, or Lake ! They quaded at length, and sned to live, And found such peace, as conquerors give ; And yet, had Holkar's arm been jamed, A fairer wreath we niight have twined; † But mark I his boat is on the stream,

His squadrons, in their served tanks, Stand marshalled, on its flooded banks,

Their armour glittering, in the beam !

Why turns he back again?
A homeless renegade is near,
To point the poison, in his car,
And India's hopes are vain.

VI

The times were changed, the hour was gone, Laswaree, and Assaye were done; † But tameless was his heart, and now, With aimy, worthy of his foe, A countless host, he stand prepared To do, whate'er a leader dared ; But now he stood alone ! A soldier, and a soldier's friend, His was an open heart, and hand, And frame, to head such hardy band, And featly could be tend Each noble sport,-could rein a steed, And a'er his saddle, crouch, and bend, And wheel, with lance in rest; Or charge, where wavering formen bleed, As hundred fields might well attest, If Poonah's fight were yet forgot, Or Oogeni's rout remembered not; I

- * The name of Scindish must be familiar to every one, at all acquimited with the affairs of the East, as that of a powerful, independent, native prince. He is the head of the Gwalior Government, and may be said to have been in a state of ceaseless waifaire with the British Government, during the Marquess of Wellesley's administration, Bhonelah, pronounced Bhonelah, is the family name of the Rajahs of Nagpure or Berar. The them Rajah of Berar was in ultimace with Scindiah, when their conjoint armies were defeated at the battle of Assaye.

 + The name of Jeswint Row Holkar is, no doubt, familiar to every one acquainted with the History of British India, about the commencement of the present century. He was the head of the Holkar state, the capital of which is Indore. His whole life was one of uncersing activity, maranding, and warfare; in the latter, with some striking exceptions, he was generally successful, until he encountered the British troops in his last campaigns. His subsequent fate is sketched in the Poem.

DEAFNESS. An essny describing a really genuine Cure for Deafness, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and sunilar appliances entirely superseded, Address THOMAS KEMPE, VITORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDING, HOLBORN, LONDON.

- * Holkir was invited by Scindish, and the Rijth of Berar, to join their aims in opposing the English, and had agreed to do so; he was in the act of crossing the Nuthindish, with the whole of his army for that purpose, when he was dissuaded, by that soldier of fortune Amerikhan, then a mere inductine; to this circumstance the text must be understood to allude.
- the rest must be understood to allinde.

 † When Holkar took the field to oppose the British Government, Semdads and the Rijah of Berai had both been subdued. The army of Semdads was disastrously defeated, at Liswarine in the North of Hindooxian, by Lord Lake, on the 1st of November 1803; shout the same period,—indeed eather, on the 23rd of September of the same year, the combined armies of Semdads and the Rijah of Berai were, in like manner, signally defeated in the South of India, in the battle of Assaye, by the Duke of Wellington, then Major-General Wellesley.

 On hath the occasions allided to, Hoikar displayed great gallantry, particularly at Pootah. "His enemies," Sir John Malcolin remarks, "commenced the action, and were successful in forcing a body of hisse to retreat;—Jeswint Row, the instant he observed this tetrograde movement, volung upon his horse, and addressing a small party of his men, advised all who did not intend to die or conquer, to save themselves, and return to their wives and children. As for me, he exclaimed, I have no intention of surviving this div; if I do not gain the victory where can. I fly to?" Again,—"At Poonah he led the charge on Scindiah's gins, and being dismonined, and pailled from his horse, by an Artillety officer of great strength, he wrestled with his enemy on froit, till one of his attendants came to his aid, and after slaying his autagonist, remonoted him."—The same author proceeds—"The Patans of Ameer Khan, who had been the first to turn their backs, at the commencement of the day, were now the most forward to plunder; they had reached the skins of the city, and began the work of pillage and massacre, when Jeswint Row ondered some of his own gins to play upon them. It was the only inder the Patans would have obeyed; but they did not wholly desist, till a party of them trying to furce the sufeguards, that were sent to protect the place, Jeswint Row, wounded as he was, galloged to the spot, and slew two or three of them, with his spear. He, on this occasion, as at Ougem, displayed a remarkable degree of personal energy."

 —Malcoln's Central India.

I think, I see him yet ; His swarthy hue, and piercing eye, As dark, as blackest jet ; He had but one, and he would sav. In his light hours, all jestingly, That he must be a princely knave, * A thought, thou knowest the vulgar have. He loved the pleasures of the bowl, Th' impassioned glance of black-eyed maid, That looks, into the soul, A thousand things, tongue hath not said, Though it would gladly tell; And yet, no reveller was he, He knew a soldier's duty well, And practised what he knew. In battle field, with peril nigh, In courtly feat of chivalry, No bearing was more stern or high ; Hs when he hurled, in buor of woe, Defiance, at his English foe. " He said, his saddle was his throne, That hosts, in war, should find their graves,-" Vast realms his armies overrun, " And whelm, like ocean's waves." Such was the man, who now arose. Our stern oppressors to appose : Even such was Halkar, such his guise : Perhaps a second, yet, may rise.

VII.

I joined his ranks; he led the way Northward, to meet our enemy; At last we met; we stong at bay, Then turned, and seemed to fly : Twas all a feint,-they followed far ; But still we seemed to fly the war; We reached the Chumbul's stream, and then, We turned, and drove their home again, Aye I chased like frightened deer ; And many a maiden's cheek, with fear, Shall blanche, when they shall read, or hear The borrors of thy stream Bunnas, Mokundra's or Biana's Pass, + (To be continued.)

THE season of amusements in Calcutta was opened by Professor Richard from New Zealand in the Theatre Royal. The first week of his exhibition of free cure of the cirpple and the blind attracted more than full houses. There was danger from overcrowding and from stormy scenes, the Professor exhibiting a temper institled to a healing physician. He has now retired to his private chamber where he practises his trade charging for every treatment except the preliminary consultation. On the boards he has been replaced by Mr. Hudson and his new Surprise Party. The Columbia Rink on the Maidan opens to-day. The Twinning 95 96 Company begin their performances at the Cornthian also from this evening.

THEY are preparing to break up camp at Simla. The Viceroy has left and the members of his Council come down by the end of this month, Mr. Ritchie who meant to eigny his two months' leave on the heights has cancelled it. He returns to Calcutta on the 7th when he resumes office as Chairman of the Corporation.

THE notice inviting applications for the post of Vice-Chairmanship of the Calcutta Curporation, which falls vacant from January next, is out. Since the last two months, in anticipation of the advertisement, canvassing has been going on and the Commissioners are either bespoken or committed. Votes at these elections usually go by the number of visits received by the Commissioners from the candidates : the applicant who can make the largest record is almost sure of success. The manner of appointment, besides imporing the usefulness of the office, reduces its dignity. The heartless dissection to which candidates are subjected is another serious impediment to the good and the true offering themselves. The Commissioners must mend their way if they want a worthy and independent man as their Vice-

HERE is a simple mode of preparing vapour baths for the mad-dog-

"When a person is bitten by a mad alog he must, for seven successive days, take a vipour bath—"a la Russe, as it is called—inf 57 to 63 degrees. This is the preventive reineily. A vipour bath may be quickly made by putting three or four red-lint bricks in a backet or tub of water, and let the patient sit over it on a cane bottomed or willow chair, enveloped in a large blanket, for fifteen or twenty minutes. When the disease is declared it only requires one vapour bath, rapidly increasing in 37 centificate, then slowly to 53; and the patient must strictly confine himself to his chamber until the cure is complete." complete

DR. G. W. Leitner writes to the Times :—

"Sn.—The writer on 'Indian Affurs' in the Times points out the aboutive conclusion of on Liw in deciding the dispine between the Hindu guardians and the worshippers at Buddh's Temple at Buddho Gryt, which his been taken care of by the Hindu Mohmu, for the time being, in winse compound it is practically situated, ever since the disappearance of the Buddhist faith from India proper. In my opinion, that conclusion—namely, of doing nothing,—is the only one to which one could have arrived in justice to the history and real encountainess of the case. For centuries were Buddhist pigrous protected and even chaished by Hindu pitests of the neighbouring monastery, till, first, the Theosophical impostine, in amateur writers on Buddhism, brought on Enropean interference, which, however well meant, is ever disastrons to Orientals and to Oriental institutions. Nothing can, for instance, exceed the grote-que absindity of our archaeological restoration, the sticking up of incommerable heads of Buddhist, like so many flawerpots, all found the enclosures of the temple, in which boxes of sardines, straps of Manchester goods, and similar offerings of European manufacture attest alike the perty and progress towards civilization of the Buddhistic worshippers. Solly and heart homeostantics that the first part of the progress towards civilization of the Buddhistic worshippers.

strips of Manchester goods, and similar offerings of European manifecture attest alike the piety and progress towards civilization of the Buddhistic worshippers. Still no harm happened under the genual supervision of the H with Mohunt till the pseudo-Buddhists alinded to interfered, not to protect their so-called co-religionists, but to air their own self-importance.

Christian proselytism also added a cause for further mutinion, till at last the Huddi guardian, in a place teening with instruces of religious toleration and good will, seems to have been driven to a self-assertion, if not to a display of anger, which, I believe, was, at the time I knew him, also it his nature. How untolerable has been the worry inflicted on this personage and him great was his sullcitude for members of a rival creed may be inferred from the following, if which I was a witness in 1886:—

I was a witness in 1886;—
Coloniel—was an anateur photographer, as also a great supporter of missions. After visiting the Mount I unfortunately met the coloniel, who begged me to use my influence with the Hindu gnardian in order to compel a number of Buddiust pilgrims then present to kneel before the sacred Bo tree where Buddha had meditated, instead of the usual musing posture, so that the colonel might photograph

^{*} The people of India, for I believe the idea is not confined to the Hindoos, suppose that a person with any obliquity of vision, or defect of that nature, must be a rogue.

[†] All of these names indicate localities, in which the British troops ancountered great disasters, in their retreat under the Houble Colonel Manson, before the armies of Holkar in 1804.

them in an attitude that was really uncongenial to true Buddhists. The Mohunt declined to induce any one to worship in any particular way, and also expressed his disapproval of making it the object of a photograph. Nothing dannted, the colonel forced the poor pilgrims to kneel before the tree, and then triumphantly came back to us with his negative, hoping that this photograph would record the last occasion on which these benighted heathers had bowed to sinck and to kneel before the tree, and then triumphantly came back to us with his negative, hoping 'that this photograph would record the List occasion on which these beinghted heathens bad bowed to sinck and stone, and that in future they would bend their knee only to the Lord Jesus.' I need not describe my indignation and the shocked surprise of the Mohunt, but I still consider that this occurrence is typical of the mixture of hypocrisy, love of sensation, and greed (if the colonel was paid for his photograph) that make up nearly every case of European interference with Native customs that I have known within the last 30 years. Formerly things were better in that respect. So saturated was the air at Buddha Gya with toleration to other creeds that the British Commissioner of the district presented a very fine and large bell, or rather metal gong, to the main Hindu temple, on which his name and gift are inscribed. When I, however, was there a Calcutta paper manufacturer visited it, and noticing a portable sculptine of the sungeod Sinya asked the Hindu priests whether he might be allowed to carry it away. 'Your lordship is master,' was the polite reply of native resignation and despair in the presence of a member of the ruling ince, but it really only meant, 'You have the priests and worshippers in profound grief at the sacrilege.

Furtunately, I had just ding up a very fine carving of Surya in the bed of a river some miles away, and I presented it to the temple, not, of course, to encourage idolatry, but to remove an impression unfriendly to Europeans, and thus, to our Government.

As for the Mohum wishing to consecrate the standent of the temple, not, of course, to encourage idolatry, but to remove an impression unfriendly to Europeans, and thus, to our Government.

As for the Mohum wishing to consecrate the standent of the biddha, or rather to make an entry of its existence in his records, as it were, before allowing it to be pin into the temple, this was merely in order to prevent its being made an object of traffic,

Very true and wise words these.

LORD Rosebery being asked, if he would support any proposals of the present Government for the reform of the House of Lords with a view to strenthening that body, or whether he was not rather in favour of its abolition, replied to his correspondent :- "I have never advocated the abolition of the House of Lords, but have repeatedly stated that it is impossible without a revolution. With regard to any measures of reform of that House which the present Government may introduce, I propose to see them before expressing any opinion upon them."

THE other day we gave the names of the six richest men in the world, Who are the six richest women? They are Senora Cousino, Miss Hetty Green, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Mine. de Barrios (or more properly speaking, the Marquise de Roda), Miss Mary Garrett, of Balttmore, and Mine. Woleska, the great Russian landowner. Senota Cousino is a South American widow and worth 40,000,000l. sterling. She owns vast expanses of land, many cattle ranges, a fleet of eight steamships, silver, copper, and coal mines, railroads, and many houses, besides personal property in the form of splendid jewels and probably the richest of the lot. The coal mines yield her 17,000%. a month. From her silver and copper mines she receives 20,000l. Her stack farms, and her ranches yield as much as her mining property. Miss Hetty Green, the richest woman in North America, is the mistress of 10,000,000l. The Marquise de Roda is the wife of a Spanish grandee. She is a Guatemalan by birth, and de Barrios, the tyrannous President of the Republic, married her from a convent at the age of fourteen, disposing of the objections of the Mother Superior by locking that lady up. When he was murdered, his widow found herself worth 5,000,000/. Miss Mary Garrett's riches are valued at 2,000,000/., which is in stock of the Baltimore, and Ohio Railroad. Mine. Wileska's wealth comes up to the same figure.

WE read :-

"An Italian newspaper gives an account of an amusing lawsuit which has taken place lately in a Russian city in which German is the prevailing language. One man sued another (it is the Daily News which tells the story) to recover the sum of 50 roubles, the debtor having faithfully promised to return the money on 'St. Henry's Day.' But having failed to do so for a long time, the lender discovered that the Russian Orthodox Church includes no such saint as St. Henry, and the judge before whom the case was tried was much puzzled as to what verdict he should give. Happily the idea occurred to him that, saint or no saint, All Saints' Day included even the most doubtful, so and a very surround description of the second he gave indement that the 50 roubles should be returned next All Saints' Day."

A clever Judge! But was not the amount immediately payable on account of the impossible date fixed for repayment?

THE Revue des Missions Contemporaines, a Swiss magazine, tells the following story of a new god worshipped at Date, on the British following story of a new god worshipped at Daté, on the British Gold Coast.

"Daté is one of the stations of the Basel Mission. The town contains 6,000 inhabitants, of whom nearly one-fourth are Christians. A number of years ago a god took up his abode in a case near Daté. A kird was given to him every few days, and he was consolted as a wise oracle. All that the worshippers had ever seen was an aim streiched out of the cave to seize the offered kird. One day some of this who came to present the usual sacrifice resolved it see mine of the god. When the aim appeared they seized it, and dragged out of the cave a min, a wietched-looking object, his nose eaten away by ulcers, his body covered with sores. The men who had dragged him out were terrified, and fled to the town. No one understood that they had occur decreved. The monster was a god, the mightier herause so Indoous, And they came out to the cave to appease him. Full of each at the affourt put on him, 'the god' commanded his devotees to destroy then crops and their provisions, promising them to take them back into favour and save them from hunger. The infantated people did as he commanded; but he then disappeased, and left them to sinffer a terrible famine. The god betook himself to a town not far off-kiakya, in German territory. To the people of Kiakya he told his tale—of divine wisdom and power, of indigury and of revenge. They believed him, assigned him a cave as a dweld district found the town. The heathen of Daté, learning what had become of their missing god, earnestly sought by sacrifices and anchainments to bring him back. At last, by the instruction of a girl insignated by the heathen pressly sought by sacrifices and anchainments to bring him back. At last, by the instruction of a girl insignated by the heathen pressing to proprietate the offended god. ... THE question whether women ought to be allowed to study and practice medicine, has been answered in the negative by Professor Albert of Vienna University.

Albert of Vienna University.

"The Professor argues that all the works of human society that surround us are the creation of the male sex; that men have never been thoroughly comprehended by women; that the proper sphere if woman is unternity; and that the study of medicine, though perfectly possible to woman, does not repay her the numeroe principal to master it. For she is, for the most path physically and pay incally micapable of practically pursuing the profession, so that the turne of the many years required to master it is usually thrown away, and goes onnewarded. The zoon politicon, the method is being, the animal of culture, is exclusively the mile. But it Professor goes on to argue that the quadifications which women in cinably possess for dealing with the sick may be notised in another way. He proposes to make ladies who have received a certain amount of editerion the regular assistants of physicians and surgeons, in his talk as well as out of them. For this purpose they should receive its inction in the elements of anatomy, physiology, hygene, cannisty, and natural science, and this should be followed by theoretical my practical instruction—say, for a couple of terms in surgery, generology, and midwifery. They would then be quadified to be doctors' is istains, and should be distinguished from the press it class of biri putually instructed midwives and nurses only practically trained, and without any scientific knowledge."

In America, they are discussing the question-What class furnishes the largest proportion of its own members to the ranks of vice? In other words, what occupations seem to most fivou this downward tendency. Of twenty-two answers, sixteen say "fictory guls," shop girls," "sales women," "waitresses;" for say "danestic servants;" and two "those too idle to have any occur mon". Thus, it is said, it is the women who are engaged in public occupations who are most in danger. Dr. Woods Hutchinson, in a paper on the Economics of Prostitution, read before the American Academy of Miedicine at Baltimore, says :

"Again, we have the commercialization of women as a powerful factor in the production of this vice. It is based upon a trade instinction pure and simple. Space does not permit me to enter upon the subject here, but I wish to record my solemn and sorrowful conviction that the woman who works outside of the home or the school pays a fearful penalty, either physical, mental, or moral, and often all three. She commits a binlogic crime against herself and against the community and woman labor ought to be forbidden for the same reason that child labor is. Any nation that works its women is damned.

THE following is going the round of the Indian press :-

"A point of law rather important to Europeans in India was settled in the Chief Court of the Punjab on the 17th instant (Sep.) by M. Justice Frizelle and Mr. Justice Rivaz. It appears that Mr. McGregor, of Simla, was charged before the District Magistrate by the Municipal Committee with disobeying a Municipal order. Mr. McGregor claimed to be tried by a jury, but the District Magistrate disallowed the claim. He proceeded with the trial and sentenced Mr. McGregor to a fine of Rs. 50, and also a further continuing fine of Rs. 680. Accused appealed to the Chief Court through his counsel, Mr. J. R. E. Gouldsbury, and after hearing the argument Justices Frizelle and Rivaz quashed the whole of the proceedings, on the ground that Mr. McGregor, having claimed to be tried by a jury, the District Magistrate could not proceed with the trial except by jury."

The report is not sufficiently full for any comment. We may stull remark that the magistrate provoked the appeal by his order of continuing fine. But if every offence under a Municipal Act were to be tried by jury, the Act must be a dead letter to the privileged.

CREMATION is progressing slowly in Christian Europe. The Zurich Cremation Society numbers 1,97 members with funds amounting to 10,200 fr. Last year forty corpses were cremated. The charge for each cremation is 65fr. for persons dying in Zurich, and 95 for others. In Paris, the numbers of cremation were—1889, 49; 1890, 121; 1891, 134; 1892, 159; 1893, 189; 1894, 216; 1895 (four months), 75.

OUR OWN NEWS,

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS.

-arableton-

THE leading Loudon newspapers attach the greatest gravity to the news from the Time? Hangkong correspondent regarding the concessions made to Russia by China, and say that, if the statement is tine, Great Brittin will be bound to intersence. The Engish Foreign Office is absolutely without any information on the subject so fai. The Duly Graphic announces, on what it says high official authority, that the outline of the treaty has no resemblance whatever to the actual facts. The Russian Embassy positively denies the Times' telegram regarding the Port Arthur treaty. The Temps is convinced that the report published by the Times represents the future if not present position of affairs, as it is impossible to suppose that Russia would neglect such a unique occasion for profiting by the condition of China.

UNEASINESS continues to be felt regarding the political situation, more specially in respect to the relations between Great Britain and Russia. The tone of the European Bourses on Thursday was characterized by nervousness. A Russian official communique declares that the political outlook is tranquil, and therefore not calculated to inspire any uneasiness.

A LITTLE cloud appears in the African Continent. The swarthy King of Coomassie is reported to have rejected the British ultimatum, saying that he prefers war, for which he is fully prepared.

DURING the debate, in the French Chamber of Deputies, on the Southern Railway scandals, M. Ribot denied the charges made by the Socialists that the Government was hushing up the affair in order to screen certain Deputies. Nevertheless the motion of M. Rouannet for fresh prosecutions was carried by a majority of 130. The defeat of M. Ribot's Ministry was due to a coalition of the Socialists and Conservatives. The Cabinet thereupon resigned. President Faure accepted the resignation.

In the treaty concluded between France and Madagascar, the Queen accepts an absolute protectorate under the French. A Resident General has been appointed at Antananarivo, and France will control the foreign relations and internal financial affairs of the country. She also reserves the right to maintain an adequate military force. France, however, assumes no responsibility for anterior treaties or concessions inade by the Queen. At the instance of General Duchesne, the Queen has appointed the former Minister of the Interior as Premier. M. Hanotaux, the French Fareign Minister, msists on France upholding the treaty with Madagascar, while several Radical Deputies desire simple annexation. The difference caused delay in the formation of a new Cabinet which has just heen formed by Mr. Bourgeois belonging to the Radical party. M. Donmer has accepted the portfolio of the Minister of Finance, and M. Bourgeois takes that of the Interior. The portfolio of Foreign Affairs has not yet been filled. M. Hanotaux, to whom it was offered, declined it, because he objects to the annexation of Madagascar, which is part of the policy of the New Cabinet.

SIR Philip Currie, British Ambassador, had an audience with the Sultan on the 27th October, which lasted an huir, during which his Majesty gave satisfactory assurances that he would faithfully execute the modified reforms in Armenia agreed to by the Powers, and would appoint worthy and competent officials to supervise them.

SERIOUS disturbances, accompanied by bloodshed, have taken place in different parts of Armenia. At Erzingian alone sixty Armenians lost their lives. The Turks affirm that the Armenians killed the Imam at Erzingheau. Hence arose the slaughter. A German eye-withness states that a brutal murder of a number of Armenians was committed at Trebizonde on the 8th instant. He estimates that six hundred were killed. Russian spectators confirm the German account and state that seven to eight hundred male Armenians were butchered and that the adjoining villages were burned by the troops, aided by the police.

THE Turkish Embassy positively devies the Standard correspondent's telegram regarding the summary trial and execution of fifty members of the Liberal party.

SERIOUS fighting between the Mussalmans and the Armenians took place at Bitlis, in Asiatic Turkey, on Friday last week. The Turks assert that the Armenians attacked the mosques. Many were killed and wounded in the encounter. Auother telegram says that the Turks have killed 150 Armenians at Baibout in Armenia and have outraged and mutilated a number of women. Many houses were burned. Similar scenes were enacted at Gimushdagh near Trebizund.

ACCORDING to Turkish accounts there are 26,000 insurgent Armenians in the mountains in the Zeitin district.

STILL on the Turk! Age has not softened Mr. Gladstone's hatred of the Sublime Porte. He sticks to his bag and baggage treatment of the unspeakable. In a letter to Madame Novikoff regarding the Armenian settlement, he says that the wretched Sultan, whom God has given as a curse to mankind, is triumphant, with Russia, France and England at his feet. The letter concludes by expressing a hope that God will send a speedy end to the official Turk and all his doings. If the Almighty can endure the Turk, why not Mr. Gladstone, great though he is?

LORD Salisbury, speaking at Waifords on October 30, said that he would endeavour, for the sake of continuity, to execute the foreign policy of his predecessors. He regretted the utterances of Mr. Gladstone in regard to the Suhan and the Armenian question, which, he said, added to the difficulties of the Pawers in their negatiations for reforms. He announced that social antelioration would be the chief home question of the Gavernment in the coming session. The lowering of prices due to free trade has, he said, almost killed agriculture in several countries.

It is reported from Teheran that a Russian company has been formed with a capital of two and-a-half milhon roubles to build a road to connect Teheran with the Cispian Sea, the Russian Government guaranteeing a dividend of five per cent.

Least Saturday Lord Elgin drave to Fattehpur-Sikri, 24 miles S. W. of Agra. The Viceregal party left Agra at seven in the morning in a barouche and a brake of the Royd Actillery buttery drawn by teams of artillery horses which in two hours and half completed the distance, Mr. E. W. Smith, of the Archæ slogical Survey, N -W. P, author of The Moghol Architecture of Fathpur-Sikri, acted the guide. The city abounds in marvellons, monuments, of Indian architecture and decorative art, no two haildings being alike in design. The whole day was devoted to the magnificent ruins of Akbar's palace. On Monday there was a parade of the Bikanir camel corps, 440 strong, under the command of Thakur Dip Sing. The corps turned out very well, causing surprise by the smartness of the men, the condition of the camels and the steadmers of their in-vements. One section of the corps was in marching order, each sowar having a British soldier of the East Surrey Regiment on the back sent of the camel, together with food, ammunition, clothing, water, and every other requisite for both men and camels for five days. It is the only camel corps in India,

In the afternoon Lord Eigin received visits from the Maharaja of Bhadawar, the Raja of Manipuri, the Raja of Awa, the Raja of Tirwar and Sett Luchman Das, the Muttra banker. In the afternoon, the Viceregal party drove out about five miles to Sikendra and the tomb of the Emperor Akbar. Next day, the Fort and the Jail claimed the Viceroy's attention. The day closed with a visit to the Taj in moonlight. On the 31st, the Viceroy arrived at Gwalior and was given, a right royal welcome. The young Maharaja, now 19 years of age was present at the railway station to receive Lord Eigin. From the station, they drove to the Guest Hause where the Viceregal Party took their quarters. Soon after the Maharaja paid the usual ceremonial visit.

WHEN the present Home Member takes over charge of the Lieutenant Gavernment of Bengal, Mr. J. Wouddhum succeeds Sir A Mackenzie in the Viceroy's Council. It was again and again runnouted and contradicted that the present Chief Secretary to the Bengal Government would be sent to the Central Provinces. It now appears that Mr. C. J. Lyall, M. A., LL. D., C. S. L., C. I. E., Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department, now on furlough, gets the Chief Commissionership of the Central Provinces. Where then shall the Hon'ble H. J. S. As Superintendent of the Zemindaries of Raja Ranajit Sing of Nashipore, Babu Aburup Chandra achieved success. Unwilling to stand in the way of his advancement, his late emplayer has parted with him reluctantly. Raja Ranajit is a young man of promise. Already he has made a mark by his judicions liberality, business-like habits, and urbanity of disposition. Bahu Gopal Lal makes an acquisition, for his new manager, besides being the scion of a respectable and well-known house, has business experience and familiarity with the details of Zemindari management. We hope Babu Seal will stick to his choice. He is young and may yet make himself a useful member of society. He has good examples in his own family—in his uncle Heralal and grand-father Mattlal.

A USEFUL institution is the "Hindu Sitkara Samiti," It is a necessity of the time. Its object is to assist Hindu families in the last rites to their dead. In a large town like Calcutta, where next door neighbours do not always know each other, great difficulties are encountered in the removal of corpses to the burning ghat. The bodies cannot be touched by other than castemen. Sametimes delicate ladies may be seen leaving the Zenaoa and exposing themselves to the public gaze in discharging the duties, at the last moment, of affection and piety to husbands or brothers. mothers or other dear kinsmen or kinswomen. The accomplishment of these demands a large measure of physical endurance. The " Hindu Satkaia Samiti" undertakes, un notice, to supply the required number of hands. In the case of the poor who are unable to meet the costs, the "Samiti" finds them from its own funds The Secretary, Prasanna Kumar Muokerjee, the soul of the institution, is a man of energy. He was formerly a Palice officer. During the last epidemic he disposed of a number of dead bodies. Such an institution should not be allowed to die from want of support. The very etymology of the word Satkiraprous act-shows that, from a Hindu point of view, assistance freely rendered is highly mentorious. Within the few months of the " Samiti's" existence, Babu Prasanna Kumara has had some strange experiences. The relatives of a poor Hindu, who were unable to find the costs of his cremation, had a proposal made to them by a mous Mussilin in that he was willing to stand the expenses of the deceased's disposal provided it was by interment and provided also the deceased was allowed to be sanctified by the Kalma according n the Kuran. Babu Prasanna Kumar heard of the matter by accident and, instead of hirral, cremation took place according to the rites of the Hindu religion. In the appeal the "Samiti" has put forth occurs the well-known Sanskut verse which says that the thomest fibres, united together, may bind an elephant in rut, and little drops, by force of number, may fill the largest tank to averflowing. We hope the sense of this ancient saw will not be lost on our countrymen,

THE arrangements made for the Bengal District Road Trainway Company (Howrah-Sheakhalla) bunted, are satisfactory. The capital is Rs. 5,40 000, divided into 5,400 shares of Rs. 100 e ich. A minimum interest of 312 per cent is go manteed. The Culs bave been judiciously distributed Rs to to be paid with application, Rs. 20 in allotment, and the balance to three calls of Rs. 31, Rs. 20, and Rs. 20 within approximately 3, 6, and 9 mostlis respectively. The Directory is strong, consisting of Sir T. A Maitin, Mr. P. F. Hedger, Mr. R. N. Mookerjee, Rai Labit Mobe a Sinha Bahador, Baba Nandala' Gossam, and Babu Harendra K ohna Scookerjee. The promoters of the scheme, it seems, have paid some attention to our remarks in a former issue about the appointment of directors from among families of local influence and expensesce. From the estimates prepared, the revenue receipts are expected to be not less than 1114 per cent, on the total capital. The portion of the Hoogbly district which the line will tap abounds in all soits of articles required for the Calcutta market. Wining so far back as 1882, the Commissioner of Burdwan said that "there is no doubt that the central and western portions of the tract lying between the Houghly and Damooda Rivers is extremely populous and fertile, and that it deserves, and would amply repay, opening up by a Railway." The guage will be 2 feet, and the length for the present will be 20 miles. Starting from Telkalphat at Howrah the line will pass through Bantra, pass along the old Benares Road, make a diversion through Janai, then run to Sneakhalla through some intermediate villages that are well known. There are some jute and paddy marts, and some large and well-supplied vegetable hats that will be tapped. There are two important centres of cotton fabrics also, such as Kharsarye and Rejubalhat. The wares of these two places are well known in Calcutta. The passenger traffic also will be respectable. The District Board of Howrah and that of Honghly have both granted the Company the free use of as much of the Roads within their respective inrisductions as the line may take up. The Hooghly Board have granted a favourable concession, viz, that on five unles of the line being declared open, the Board will pay to the Company, by way of interest on the capital paid up and spent, such a sum of money as may make the net profit equivalent to a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent, per annum. The maximum for which the Board will thus be liable is Rs. 450 per annum per mile. In ceturn the Board will have a third of the profits in excess of 10 per cent, per annum. By far the best inducement to shareholders is that Messis, Martin and Co, as contractors of the line, will pay during construction 31/2 per cent. interest on payments to them.

DEAFNESS COMPLETELY CURED! Any person suffering from Deafness, Noises in the Head, &c., may learn of a new, simple treatment, which is proving very successful in completely curing cases of all kinds. Full particulars, including many unsoluted testimonial and newspaper press in tities, will be sent post free on application. The system is, without doubt, the most successful ever brought before the public. Address, Aural Specialist, Albany Buildings, 39, Victoria Street, Westiminster, Londou, S. W.

Four out of the six Directors, it will be noted, are native gentlemen of respectability. The business capacity of Sir T. A. Martiu and Mr. Hedger, and their reputation in the commercial world of Culcutta, are a guarantee of success.

THE Coroner's inquest in the Commercial Buildings tyagedy was as mysterious as the tragedy itself. It throws no light. At any rate, the morning papers report little or nothing. The verdict of the jury is that W. Collingwood had died at the hands of J. G. Pigh, under what circumstructs or from what more there is no evidence to shew, and J. G. Pigh thereafter took his own life.

PROSECUTIONS FOR OBSCENITY.

THE recent prosecution of a Hindu physician in the Calcutta Police Court for what was considered improper advertisements, has, as we have already reported, ended in the withdrawal of the complaint, the accused undertaking to modify or suppress the objectionable passages. He had translated literally into English some verses from ancient Hindu medical works of accepted authority. The translations appeared in a catalogue of medicines named and prepared according to directions in such treatises as fall within that branch of Sanskrit literature which is somewhat loosely styled "Ayurveda." The catalogue not only names the medicines but indicates their virtues, describing the diseases in which they are prescribable. In the preface, the Kaviraj says, "In mentioning the medicines, great care has been taken to describe the diseases in which they are administered. The peculiar feature of this catalogue consists in the description of those diseases. In many cases the language has been reproduced of the medical Rishis of India. This catalogue is not, therefore, a mere trade publication. It will repay perusal. It is practically a small treatise on disease and medicine for domestic reference.

No objection has ever been taken to the publication of the original works on Hindu medicine. In fact, those works have been repeatedly published both at Calcutta and Bombay. So long as the Hindu system of cure continues to be professed and practised, those works will certainly be read and followed. Even if it perishes outright, notwithstanding the many visible signs of a revival, in its competion with the Western mode of cure, the medical literature of mediæval India, that is exceedingly voluminous, may not yet die. To the historian of medicine and medical science, that literature will never fail to be of interest. Whether the Greeks derived their medical lore from India or not, resemblances occur between the Greek and the Hindu medical systems that are certainly striking. The history of medicine has yet to be written, and when written, the connection between Greek and Hindu medicine will form a very important chapter. To stop the publication of Hindu medical books, so long as they have readers and so long as the history of medicine, showing its gradual development, has an interest for mankind, cannot but be an unmitigated evil. No medical literature can be free from things that are unmistakably prurient or obscene to the general reader. Yet it is not only tolerated but also carefully studied for the sake of its scientific value. Humunity is subject to ugly diseases. Writers on medical science cannot pass them over for fear of offending the modest. A professedly medical catalogue, which mentions the drngs in use among the profession, can no more omit the remedies than a professed work on pathology ignore the diseases. So long, therefore, as man is obliged to bear with those maladies, he must bear with their descriptions also in language.

In judging of the pruriency of a publication, there is one important consideration that should not be forgotten. That consideration is connected with the place where the objectionable matter occurs. Dit is matter in the wrong place. Every dictionary contains words and definitions that are not only disgusting but absolutely obscene. The only cyclopædia of Sanskrit lore, the Sabdakalpadruma, contains extracts from Rishi literature that are sickening. Nobody, however, whatever the measure of his prudery, can call for the suppression of works like these. We have seen, again, that works treating of pathology or therapeutics, or surgery or obstetrics, or such as are distantly connected with these branches of knowledge, cannot be objected to for matter that may, from a general point of view, be regarded as indecent. The same consideration applies to medical catalogues. Their object is to inform suffering humanity of the recredies recommended in recognized treatises. They are intended to inform and not excite pleasure as in imaginative literature.

We must not be supposed to advocate the cause of obscenity. We make graeral observations irrespective of any particular case. There can be no possible objection to the suppression of such advertisments, for example, as do not come from regular professional men having a reputation to lose but are paraded by quacks offering nostrums to men wedded to sensuality but desirous of baffling its inevitable consequences. The law should reserve its rigour for these. It is very much to be regretted that most of the vernacular papers, week after week, come out with much filth. Here is a field for the Police to shew its activity and set the public morals right. The public theatres are under a censorship, but when will the authorities begin to examine the advertisement columns of the daily and the weekly press which are not often guardedly worded?

Wide as the subject is of pruriency in literature, we cannot close our remarks without some reference to the ancient or sacred literature of India. That literature, judged by modern canons, must be held as containing much that is undoubtedly filthy. There are passages in the two great epics that cannot be read in the class room or a family circle. Many of the poems of mediaval India, again, contain passages of pronounced pruriency. For all that, nobody can demand the suppression of those grand works of genius. The language being obsolete, they can be read by only the learned few. For this reason their suppression is undesirable. Then, again, as works of art, they are immortal for their grandenr and beauty. The palace of marble that the Danava architect built for the heroic sons of Pandu has passed away. The very site of that wonderful monument of engineering is unknown. The glowing description, however, which the genius of Vyasa has left of that structure is still as fresh as ever, and thousands read it with pleasure and profit to this day. For the sake of that pleasure and profit which every page of the book affords, every one ought to put up with it occasional blemishes.

These remarks apply with equal force to the ancient and sacred literature of other countries. Examine them in even the translations of modern scholars; their deformity is equally apparent. The historical or antiquarian as also the artistic value, that attaches to them, should prevent their suppression or even mutilation. The sensible portion of the world is agreed that the mischief that may be expected from them is very little, compared with their general utility. Some of the universities of Europe at one time insisted upon what were called "expurgated editions." Fearing, however, to mangle outright those great works of genius, the expurgators sometimes placed the objectionable passages together in the appendix. The folly of the course became soon manifest. Byron has immortalised it in one of his scathing stanzas. The world, as a matter of fact, has not become a whit worse for permitting the works of Horace to appear in the form that he gave them. The classical myths have done more good to mankind by their general merits than mischief by their lusciousness. As regards modern literature, even Swinburne and Zola have not only been tolerated but come to be respected for their

Another point is the difficulty of deciding what really constitutes obscenity to be put down. The celebrated case of Stockdale vs. Hansard may be referred to in illustration. A Parliamentary committee had pronounced one of Stockdale's publications obscene, deciding, in cutting language, its pretensions to be considered as a medical work. The report they submitted was published by Hausard, the authorised publisher of both Houses. Stockd de sued Hausard. Experts were examined. Most of them deposed to the scientific character of the publication, The verdict of the Parliamentary committee was upset. The jury held that Stockdale's publication was not obscene, and the judge, Lord Denman, agreeing, heavy damages were awarded against Hansard The case is not more famous for the dispute to which it led between the judicature and the lower House of Parliament than for the reversal, by a competent jury, upon the evidence of experts, of the opinion of a committee of the Commons. This feature of the case is somewhat clouded by the gravity of the other issues that arose out of it. Nothing; however, is more certain than that prosecutions for obscenity in literature or art should not be hastily commenced. Art, again, has especial canons. Many statues and pictures, condemned in haste or ignorance as objectionable, have been saved for the admiring world by the common sense of juries acting on the evidence of experts.

In India there ought to be a regular department for instituting prosecutions for obscenity. No Police Commissioner, however able, unless properly assisted, can form a correct opinion. The opinions of experts should be called for before the aid of the law is invoked. Convictions by Magistrates upheld by Sessions Judges have been set aside by the High Courts. A public prosecution is a grave evil to the victim. A verdict of acquittal may mean financial ruin to the acquitted. Then, again, hap-hazard prosecutions terminating in the triumph of the accused, cause much mischief in other directions. Considering how narrow is the line that separates the obscene from the unobjectionable, such trials should never be held without the aid of juries. The fate of Vidyasagar or Pandit Tarkavachaspati, in the Court of an Indian Magistrate, would have been uncertain in a prosecution based upon the publication of Kumara Sambhava or Birth of the War God, which is universally recognised as one of the best fruits of Kalidasa's genius.

THE OCHTERLONY COLUMN.

CALCUITA'S PRINCIPAL LANDMARK.

A well-known London merchant once assured me that he had passed St. Paul's Cathedral at least twice daily for forty-two years, and never seen the interior of that august pile. Clearly public buildings resemble prophets in receiving scanty appreciation in their native place. If a bundred denizens of the Ditch were asked what they considered to be the most conspicuous object within that what they considered to be the most conspicuous object within that imaginary enclosure, ninety-nine would probably answer "the Ochienlony Column," but the percentage able to give a connected account of its history would be very much smaller. The present moment, when it is receiving a much-needed coat of colour, is an opportune one for recalling to the public memory the vicissitudes that attended its construction.

Sir David Ochterlouv deserved better of his country than many who have been honoured with even more pretentious monument. He belanged to a race which has had a very large share in the task of laying the foundations of the Empire. Though bern at Boston, then the capital of an English colony, he came of shire family. Arriving in India as a cadet in the Company's army in 1776, he climbed to the rank of Colonel after twenty-seven Holkar, but his opportunity for gathing supreme distinction did not come till 1814, when the aggressions of the Nepalese drove the Matquis of Hastings into a declaration of war. Sir David was appointed to the command of an Army which invaded the Western portion of the long strip of Terai, and he stormed one hill fort after another and compelled the arrogant Gurkhas to sue for peace. A draft treaty was presented to the Durhar; but with characteristic duplicity, the Maharaja delayed executing it, and strove hard the while to augment his forces. The Governor General was not to be trifled with. During the Waterloo year 33,000 men were poured into Napal from Tirhut. They penetrated to a spot within easy striking distance of Katmandu, and the Maharaja "climbed down."

The second blow would have involved the abandonment of the scheme, but for the public spirit of the contractor, a Mr. Parker, who volunteered to complete the column at a total cost of Rs. 33,000, provided that he received dividends from the estate of both the defunct concerns. "AN INDIAN JOURNALIST."

(From Petter, September 22, 1895.)

I HAVE been reading Mr. Skrine's life of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, entitled "An Indian Journalist" which was published last Stunday. The publication of this work is the only notable event of the past few days. That a Civilian who is the biographer of no less a person than the Lieutenant-Governor of the day should unbend himself so far as to undertake the task of writing the life of an Indian Journalist, who all along occupied a more or less isolated position in his community and was more of a dreamer than a warker, is indeed a very gratifying sign of the times-though old Sambhu was one of those men whom it was impossible to know without loving him passionately. Old Sambhu had a heart, and he felt for others to an extent which is rare in this cold, calcu-A draft treaty was presented to the Durhar: but with characteristic duplicity, the Maharaja delayed executing ir, and strove hard the while to augment his forces. The Governor General was not to be trifled with. During the Waterloo year 33,000 men were poured into Napal from Trintut. They penetrated to a spot within easy striking distance of Kaumandu, and the Maharaja "climbed down." The treaty of peace and alliance which was then executed has continued in force for eighty years.

In 1816 the grand old General received the dubious honour of a baronetcy. He survived to render excellent service to the State as Divisional Commander during the operations against the Pindari and Mahrattas in 1817-18, which were conducted on a scale never since attempted in India. He died at Mirat, full of years and honours, in 1825. His countrymen resolved to keep the veteran's memory green by a petimanent memorial, and a public meeting was held at the Town Hall which appointed a Committee to collect subscriptions. The movement was headed by Sir Charles, afterwards Lord, Metcalfe, a name great and venerable in the Bengal Civil Service, and he was actively assisted by others of light and leading in their day. Rs. 40,000 was soon subscribed, and an amateur architect was uncarthed in the person of Mr. Charles latterly he appears to have become a veritable autograph hunter. Any European of distinction whom he happened to meet anywhere was sure to be the recipient of a letter from Sambhu. From Rosebery down to the humblest guest at Government House, not one escaped the attentions of the autograph-hunter. The story of Sambhu's life as narrated by Mr. Skrine is rather disappointing as it leaves several gaps which somewhat puzzle the reader.

Lord Dufferin and Sir Auckland Colvin appear to have found in Sambhu a regular correspondent. They evidently regarded him as a garrulous old fool and enjoyed his pleasantries. They appreciated his scholarship and his command of the English language, his rich fund of humour, his quaint observations of men and things it general, his frankness and the truly oriental warmth of his heart.

They liked him all the more for giving it hot and strong to his own cantisymen, and for his out and out support of the measurement. countrymen, and for his out and out support of the measures of Government. The writer of the Baroda Pamphlet was not the same man who week after week sang Hosanna to the glory of the White Brahmins whose worship occupied so much of his last days.

But I doubt if any one ever took him seriously. Seriousness was foreign to his constitution. Poppy and Mandagoors do not make a man serious. Sambhu was a splendid failure in life. There is not another instance of a man endowed with so much ability who failed to accomplish anything worth accomplishing. His scholar-ship was something astonishing. His literary powers were un-questionably of a high order. But still his life was a failure. We all loved, liked and adored him, but I for my part never expected him to play a prominent part in the affairs of his country. His paper, Rein and Rayyet, appeals to fit audience but few. To the paper, Reis and Rayyet, appeals to ht audience but few. To the people at large, his very name was unknown. It was only those who had the privilege of his friendship that could form some idea of the lovable nature of the man. A more forgiving man never lived, nor one whose heart was so full of sympathy for those that sought his counsel or help. Every young man whom he knew worshipped him as a demi-god. His love truly surpassed the love of woman. Greater scholars than he may possibly arise amongst us. Better writers we may see. But never more shall we look upon another of such a kind, warm and sympathetic heart as Sambhu. His conversation was a rare intellectual treat, and he could rivet the attention of his heaters for hours, till even the count rivet the attention of his heaters for hours, till even the small hours of the morning: Time passed so swiftly and agreeably in his charming company. The Dutts of Wellington Square, specially Jogesh Babu and Sreesh Babu, literally idolized him. But for their almost romantic devotion to Sambhu, the entire course of his life would pethaps have been directed in a different channel. Jogesh Babu had been the guardian angel of the gifted man, and but for such a devoted admirer we do not know what would have been his fate. Babu Jogesh Chunder has been mainly instrumental in bringing about the publication of this biography. He has performed a task of love and discharged a duty to his departed hero, performed a task of love and discharged a duty to his departed hero, who was everything to him and to whom he was everything. It is he whô has supplied the materials, and whose loving care has passed the pages through the press. Thinking of Sambhu I cannot but think of that loving and chivalrous soul but for whom the world would have heard very little of one of the greatest Bengalees of the present century. As for Mr. Skrine, his too has been a labour of love and we cannot be too thankful to him.

(From the Madras Standard, September 30, 1895.)

It is rarely that the life of an I idian journalist becomes wor-It is rarely that the life of an I idian tournalist becomes worthy of publication; it is more rarely still that such a life comes to be written by an Anglo-Indian and a member of the Indian Civil Service. But, it has come to pars that in the land of the Bengali Babus, the life of at least one man among Indian Journalists has been considered worthy of being written by an Englishman. Dr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee, late Editor of Rin and Pawet was a well-known scholar. He was a man of high public that Rayyet was a well-known scholar. He was a man of high intellectual attainments and a brilliant writer who cultivated assiduously the acquaintance of men in authority and of position. He died last year and his "Life, Letters and Correspondence" are now presented to us by Mr. F. H. Skime, 1. c. s. The life story of Mr. Mookerjee occupies but a small portion of the book before us. Mookerjee occupies but a small portion of the book before us.

It was a chequered one. Mookerjee was a Brahmin by buth and a Brahmin of Brahmins all his life. At the age of five, he was sent to a day school kept in the house of a local Zemindar, but here he was more remarkable for his pearls than for application to study. He was transferred to a sectarian seminary and later on he joined the Hindu Metropolitan College where he completed his studies. While at College, he started the Calcutta Monthly Magazme which had a mushroom existence. Our of College, he became for a short time the Editor of the Office, he became for a short time the Editor of the Morning Chronicle. He then joined the staff of the Hindop Patrot. There he did not remain long. At this period he began the study of the science of Homzopathy and in recognition of his researches in this branch of learning; he obtained the degree of M. D. from an American University. His next resolution was to become a lawyer and he became an articled clerk in the officer of a firm of European Attorneys. But he disliked the profession and he rejoined the Hindoo Patriol as Sub-Editor. Again, he left that paper to become the Secretary to the Taluqdars' Association and Editor of the Samachar Hindustani. His next enterprise consisted in giving up journalism for a time and becoming the Dewan of the Nawah Nazim of Bengal. Here he got into difficulties and love of change induced him to accept the Head Mastership of the Calcutta Training Academy. He had no charm for the school-master's rod and we hear of him next as Secretary to the Raja Sheoraj Singh of Kashipur and then as Minister of Hill Tippera. He was ousted from this place by the intrigues of those attached to the Raja. In 1882, he founded Reis and Rayyat and from that date till his death in 1894, he continued as its Editor. It was Mr. Mookerjee's good fortune to associate with some of the best known men in India, and his conservative opinions in social and he rejoined the Hindoo Patriot as Sub-Editor. best known men in India, and his conservative opinions in social and political matters seem to have endeared him to Europeans particularly. Some of them at least would not have befriended him it in spite of his ability and his natural gifts, he were a Congress-man. The chief attraction of the book before us consists in the letters from and to Mr. Mookerjee contained in it; and the interest in them would have been considerably heightened if they were not expurgated editions. It is certainly creditable to be told that Mr. Mookerjee was in corresponding terms with such persons as Major Evans Bell, Sir William Hunter, Sir Salar Jung, Sir Madava Row, Sir Auckland Colvin, Lord Dufferin, Sir Lepel Griffin, Professor Vambéry and Lord Lansdowne. The style in which the letters are written is indeed creditable to the writer, but in some places they seem to be laboured and disclose the vanity in some places they seem to be laboured and disclose the vanity of the writer and his great contempt for educated Bengali young men in general and Congress men in particular. The letter addressed to Sir Salar Jung contains a flattering account of the writer and his labours ending evidently with a request for patronage which Mr. Skrine omits to publish. There are several letters to Sir Auckland Colvin written very familiarly beginning with "My dear Sir Auckland" and ending with "Yours sincerely." But Sir Auckland, except in one letter, addresses him only as "Dear Dr. Mookerjee" and "Yours truly." In one letter Mookerjee and "Yours truly." In one letter Mookerjee and "Yours truly." "Dear Dr. Mookerjee" and "Yours truly." In one letter Mookerjee says "At one time I thought of going to Madras to the Congress, to see how they ordered the matter down south and keep our Boys of Bengal in check, particularly in matters of social discipline. It was not to be. I could not get a P. O. or other presumably safe steamer and I would not form part of the carge of Babudom of all castes in charge of Thomas Cook and Sons."

The book contains a letter published from Sir Lepel Griffin; but the six parts of Sir Lepel similarly while there are not less than The book contains a letter published from Sir Lepel Grimin, out there is none to Sir Lepel; similarly while there are not less than half a dozen letters of Major Evans Bell published, not one of those written to him appears in print. Sir Lepel says in his letter. I need not tell you that your estimate of the attacks made upon me by the Anglo-Bengalee press is a just one, as is your statement of the source from which they proceed." It is not difficult for us of the source from which they proceed. It is not diment for its to guess what Mookerjee must have written to elicit such a statement. In another letter to Sir Auckland Colvin he savs "Our people the Boys of the Period in the press and on the platform—are rather difficult to please. I myself don't. But I don't care "The Boys of the period, we suppose, were the leading Congressmen in Calcutta. In a third letter he writes:—"All my friends men in Calcutta. In a third letter he writes :-- "All my filends ere u.ad about the Congress and Congressists, besides all have been long since engaged. If I asked perhaps I could get a separate tent away from that bustle of our Indian Runnymede, but I would not ask Hume or Bonnetyee." It strikes us that Mookerjee would not have succeeded in becoming familiar with Viceroys and Gov not for his anti-Congress tendencies. In many of his litters to men in authority, he goes out of his way to have a fling at the Congress or his "Bengali boss". And we doubt wheth it Mokenice could have discharged his denies faithfully as a journalist tramelled by the friendship of Vicerovs and Governors.

(From the Pribute, October 2, 1895.)

"An Indian Journalist being the Life, Letters and Cirrespondence of Dr. Sambhu C. Moskerjee, late Editor of Rin and Rayya, Calcutta," is a book of which the title userf should be attractive to news, aper writers and readers. The interest of the book is heightened by the fact that it has been written by Mr. F. H. Skrine, of the Beagal Civil Service. The book is a well bound octavo willime of nearly 500 pages, but the actual life story of the Rew and Rayyet has been so honoured. Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee used to carry on correspondence with such men as Lord Dufferin, Sir Auckland Colvin and Sir Charles Elliott, and---what is perhaps more important --- he was not well disposed towards the Congress. But Mr. Skrine is not perhaps aware that this change came over Babu Sambhu Chunder after Lord Dufferin had honoured him with his acquaintance. At the Calcutta Congress of 1886 Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee was a prominent figure, and expressed the greatest admiration for the great national movement. However, it is needless to rake up the past. Mr. Skrine deserves our thanks for his tribute to the memory of an Indian journalist, and perhaps we shall hear of fewer battles royal in the Calcutta Municipality between him and certain other Indian journalists. As the book is published for the benefit of Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerice's family we hope it will have a large sale among the Indian as well as the Anglo-Indian public.

(From the Merning Post of India, October 15, 1895.)

THE latest addition to the current literature of the country is THE latest addition to the current literature of the country is a neatly got up and handy volume, entitled "Life and Letters of Sambha Chunder Mookerjee," by Mr. F. H. Skrine, of the Bengal Civil Service. It is, indeed, very good of Mr. Skrine to write a notice of the eminent Indian journalist, whom we lost n the eatly part of 1894, and to bring out a carefully-edited ielection from his currespondence: and it is very generous of him lines that the stress of the book missing of the book missing of the book missing of the book missing the stress of the book missing of the book missing the stress of the book missing of the book missing the stress of the book missing of the book missing the stress of the book missing of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the book missing the stress of the s to direct that the proceeds of the book, minus the costs of publication, should be devoted to the support of the family of the subject of the memoir, who have been left unprovided for. Mr. Skrine has performed his self-imposed task, as he says, amid harassing official cares, and in an uncongenial climate, and he prings to the work an unquestioned sympathy with educated natives, and an appreciation of their capacities, motives, and aspirations. Written by a man of undoubted literary talents the book was ushered to the notice of the public with a large, promise, and it is only fair to say that the execution has fulfilled all promise, and it is only in the book would, no doubt, have been much more useful and interesting, if the numerous letters of the more usciul and interesting, it the numerous retters of the Doctor, and the replies thereto, could have been published in full. But unfortunately the obligations that every writer has to the living, and the impolicy of placing at the disposal of the public all of what transpires behind the scenes, prevented Mr. Skrine, as it has always prevented many more eminent writers, from writing and publishing with a total want of reserve. As it is, however and publishing with a total want of reserve. As it is, however, the book has a unique interest, being the memoir of a member of the subject race by a member of the ruling body; and as such, it ought to be widely read in every part of India.

The life of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee was a peculiar one.

His genius, bright and brilliant in the extreme, was fitful and tring grants, but and in years, he never settled down steadily to anything, and though his talents, his literary accomplishments, his wide and varied range of reading, his culture, and his incisive his wide and varied range or reading, his culture, and his inchive humour, were recognized and appreciated by his countrymen all over India, his want of tact and of singleness of aim and purpose, and of devotion to one leading idea and principle of life, marred what would otherwise have been one of the most prosmarred what would otherwise have been one of the most properous and useful careers. Mr. Skrine has felt a natural delicacy in bringing out this side of the question, and in depicting the shadows that darkened the brightness of the picture. As a thorough-going admirer of Dr. Mookerjee, he will not admit that the subject of his sketch committed even one mistake; and would tather believe in a conspiracy against him, of all the salvaged and wealthy comparisons. his educated and wealthy countrymen, than Say that Dr. Moo-keijee was once misled by a misguided enthusiasm into doing something he should not have done. Mr. Skrine has said, with all someting ne should not have done. The fact and shrewhers of the practised advocate, all that can possibly be said in defence of his hero at each particular turn of life; but whether that is the true duty of the biographer, we do not know. It Dr. Mookerjee had been alive to-day, he would have been glad to see that many things, which he thought to be great and serious blunders and almost irreparable mistakes, had been presented to the world in a different light by his thorough-going One reading through Mr. Skrine's pages, would imagine Di. Samblu Chunder Mookerjee to be an ideally perfect man, which he was far from being. While giving full credit to Mr. Skine for this whole-hearted advocacy, as it were, we are not sure that it is the proper course to pursue. The true use of biography is that men, who have their voyage of life yet to go through, and their names and fortunes yet to make, might learn from the lives and experiences of others how to avoid the shoals and quicksands that obstructed their paths; to observe how they had acted in grave emergencies and interesting situations; and to shape their lines by the light of the lessons thus derived. If Mr. Skrine had interspersed his book, as he might very easily have done, with criticisms and remarks leading to this end, it would have been simply invaluable.

Besides the fact that he edited Mookerjee's Magazine and Reis and Rayyet, the only important features of Dr. Mookerjee's life were that he had been in three native courts, and that he latterly came to be a regular correspondent of several high officials. For obvious reasons his career in the native courts, in none of which he had a happy time, could not be described or delineated in detail; and the replies of the officials, so far as they let us into opinions about public topics or about each other, have to be carefully avoided. These are the difficulties under which a contemporary author must write; and we can only regret, but can-not get over them. But in reading these pages, one cannot help regretting how great a man Dr. Mookerice might have been if he had settled down to one course of life in early manhood, and pursued that course with life-long energy and devotion; if he had not been addicted to the use of opium; and if he had devoted more attention, like the eminent Kristodas Pal, to questions of policy and Imperial matters, and left local politics and personalities alone. With all his faults, however, Dr. Mookerjee was one of the most talented and accomplished men this country has produced. It is impossible not to admire his bright intellect, his chaste diction, and his keen sense of the humourous; and it is indeed fortunate that the Indian public should have a monograph, exhibiting and setting out his best qualities, from such an accomplished writer as Mr. Skrine.

Speaking of an experience of her own, a woman says: "My hands became stiff and minb. There seemed to be not feeling in them. I was so crippled that I could not even cut a round of bread. A little later it attacked my legs and feet, the sides of the latter being very tender and sare. The pain was so severe that I often sat down and cried on account of my sufferings and my helplessness. I used rubbing oils and embrocations, but I got on tehef. In this way I went on month aften month, never expecting to be well again. I felt the first signs of illness in February, 1839. OPINION ON THE BOOK.

It is a most interesting record of the life of a remark dile man.—Mi H. Bahington Sumh, Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October,

Dr. Mookerjee was a famous letter-writer

Dr. Mookerjee was a famous letter-writer, and there is a breezy freshuess and orgunality about his correspondence which make it very interesting reading—Sir Alfred W. Corf, K. C. E., Director of Public Institution, Bengal, 26th September, 1895.

Dr. Mookerjee was well worthy of the distinction accorded, so far as we know, to no other Native journalist in India, of having an English Civilian for his biographer, but the housing with the piece of the support of the personal friendship of distinguished Civilians, at Provincial Governors, and of successive Viceriys, Mr. Skirich his performed his self-imposed task in no pairmining manner, but in the spirit of one who while delighting to do housing to a great and guod man does not hide browner to a great and good man does not hide his finbles. The subject of the bingrophy was not free from finits, and Mr. Skine does not attempt to make him appear interwise.

It should not be finguiten that there are papers and papers and that as much difference. papers and papers and that as much difference exists between some of the ribid Calenta prints, and the paper which Dr. Monkerjee founded as between darkness and hight. Rete and Ruppet has always been remarkable for the mingled ability, canddin and chariableness of its criticisms, and the periodical has enjoyed a degree of influence approached by no other native weekly. The paper was so well managed by its founder as to attract general notice and bring him into confidential relations with the makers of history. He was no mere sycopbant, and his friendship with one filling the exalted places of the land was due to an effecteding endeavours land was due to no self-seeking endeavours to thrust himself upon them but to their own desire to become acquainted with a Native of desire to become acquainted with a Native of great origin throw and personal charm.

Dr. Miookerjee may be placed with the still famented Justice Telang in the category of those natives of this country who are connecting links between inlers and culed, and who by their labours, as well as by their personal example and influence, do immense service in welding rigidities the diverse communities of the land in the bonds of Imperial brother-hand and brysity—The Bombay Gazette, Sentember 23, 1895.

Furnanch of the brographical matter that issues so fixely from the press an applogy is needed. If lid on brography of Dr. Mooketjee, the Editor of Rix and Rivier, appeared, an exploation would have been booked for. A man of his remarkable permarks he been booked for.

explication would neve encourage. As no of his remarkable personality, who was easily first among nature. Imban pournalists, and in many respects occupied a higher plane than they did, and looked at public affinis from a they did, and looked at public offices from a different point of view from theirs, could not be suffered to sink into oblivious without some attempt to perpetuate by memory by the usual expedient of 1 thing. The difficulties common to all bingraphies have in this case been inof which is that the unifor belongs to a different race from the subject. It is true that ent race from the subject. It is the that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the learnest Doctor, and that he on his side understood the English chrincter as few foreigness understood it. But no spine of this and his remarkable assonitation of English modes of thought an expression, Dr. Mockerjee remained to the last a Bishour of the Brahumes—i conservation of the best of his unleistance that was nothing but respect and annuous. In consequence of this, his ideal morning that was nothing bill respect and approved. It consequence of this, his ideal biographic would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathies, and framed like him in Western to runnig. If Bengal had produced such another man as Dr. Minderjee, it was he who should have written her life.

The hography is warmly appreciative without heing occillessly landatory; it gives on the whole a complete pertine of the man; and in the brook there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters addressed to Dr. Mookeije are of such minor importance that they might have been omitted with advantage, but it a worl of his own letters could have been sparred. This cy that he writes idiomatic Englisher the area of the properties of the pr lish is to say what is short of the truth. His diction is easy and correct, clear and straight-forward, without Oriental luxurance or striving after effect. Perhaps he is never so charming as when he is laying down the taws of hierary form to young aspirants to fame. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece on page 285, to instance, is a delightful piece of criticism; it is delicate plain-speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a would-be poet that his productions are not in the smallest degree poetry, without one may conclude, either inflaming the youth or repressing his adom.

For much more that is well worth reading we may refer solves to the without piece.

For much more that is well worth reading we must refer readers to the volume uself. Intunsically it is a nook worth boying and reading.

The Pioneer, Oct. 5, 1895.
The career of "An Initian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting.

Mooketjee's letters are manyels of pure determ when it benditured by his nervous syle.

Mooketjee's letters are manyels of pine dic-tion which is beightened by his nervons style. The life has been told by Mr. Skime in a very pleasant manuer and which should make it po-pular not only with Bengalis hin with all those who are able to appreciate merit minarred by who are able to apprect the metal minimized by observation and earnestness mispoiled by harshness.—The Muhammadan, Oct. 5, 1895.

The letters interspersed through the work are both mismerive and of great value, while the name of the author will worch for the excellence of the biography.—The Bee, Oct.

excellence of the biography.—The Do.,

12, 1895.

The book has a image interest, being the memor of a member of the subject tace by a member of the ruling body; and as such, it ought to be widely read in every part of India.

Dr. Mookeijee was one of the most talented and accomplished men this country has produced. It is impossible not to admire his bright intellect, nis claste diction, and his keen sense of the humourous; and it is indeed fortunate that the Indian public should have a monograph, exhibiting and setting out his best qualities, from such an accomplished writes as Mr. Sking.—The falloring Post of India. October 15, 1895. best qualities, from single writer as Mr. Skrine —T India, October 15, 1895.

Famshore we dwell or had pur hamily Or it might merely be our haunt, For used alas I so long to roam,

I scarce know, what, by home is meant; Yet I still, we had our fields to tend, To help a summer's day to spend;

But when the nights grew long, and clear, We mounted, and took brand, and spear,

And roamed afai, they wot not where, Twas all they knew, we were not there,

Till back we came, and welcome found, As fortune had our labours crowned.

*The Nurhuddah is a stream of very considerable magnitude, which rises in the highest lable-and of Central India, and after a long course, falls into the sea, on the western coast of the Peninsula, at Barnach. It is however only navigable for small Farfit, for about a bundred miles from its mouth, owing to the rocky, and irregular nature of its bed. The following is a somewhat highly colored picture of a rapid, in its course, at Bherah Ghaut, about ten miles from Institute. But let us look once more on the Nurbuddah. Hark I "Hear ye not already his distant roar, like the sound of a sea-shell, "in your ear? Lo! there he comes with mountains, for his banks, "clothed in their ever-green forests; but let us proceed somewhat "closer, and we stand upon the very verge of the precipice, and behold his mass of waters dashing along a bed of white marble, "and now, with ceaseless roar, bursting through a chasm, so narrow, "that a bold-hearted mountaineer might leap across it; but though "the fall, below; now follow the stream in its deep and narrow "channel, and then look on its dry and uncovered bed, where the "strata of white marble shoot up their peaks, like those of snow-capt "mountains in the distance." "At the Hurn Pall, a place lower down the google effect of the "string of white instrue should be the peak, the those of show-capt monitains in the distance.

"At the Hurn Pahl, a place lower down, the opposite edges of the monitains are merely diviging by the river; the name of the Hurn Pahl is derived, from the circumstance of the river being here so obstructed, by large masses of basal, rising about ten or eleven feet above the ordinary level of the stream, and giving passage to the river, though three very narrow channels, across each of which, it is supprised an antelope could bound,"

The scenery also give banks of the Nurbuddah, in so far, as I have had an opportunit of observing, is wild, wooded, and picturesque in the extreme.

XIII. At last, we'met, and orders gave, To bounne us, for the Ganges' side ; Not, ya may judge, to quaff its wave, " But on a foray ride ; For fame spoke, loudly, of the gold, erchants' coffers could unfold, To the bright eye of day; We mounted each his steed, and then, We mustered full five hundred men, Equipped, for march or fray. wassed Myheer, and Rewah's vale, Then tarried, in that lovely dell, Beneath the Hilliah Pass, and there it !" ward, sent our scouts before, wound the shroffs of Mirzapore, I What gold they had, and where? That done, we marched, with set of sun, and reached the sown, and stood within the armed, and ready for the fight, Ere it was, scarcely, noon of night ! One moment more,-the axes clang, In fifty quarters, loudly rang, And quick, the bolts, and bars gave way, Beneath the hammer's ponderous sway ! Some, at a distance, stood, and gazed, By the feeble taper's ray ; But scarce a voice, or hand, was raised, To scare us, from our pley ; Of that, we found an ample store ! S-Each helped himself, nor asked for more.

*To drink the waters of the Ganges, or to bathe in the sirbamy considered by the Hindoos, as highly salutary in a spiritual sense All Hindoo witnesses, in Indian courts of law, are sworn by the Ganges' water, a cup of which, with a spring of myrile in it, is held in their hands, in the same manner as Christians are sworu by the Langes' water, a cup or which, with a spring of myrite in it, is held in their hands, in the same manner as Christians are aworn by the Scripures.

† This is a magnificent mountain Pass, about halfway between the town of Mirzapore and the capital of Rewah; the acenery at the bottom of the Pass is very beautiful, and at the top of il, there is a fine water-fall, in the raily season. During the hot seasopt, the bad of the stream, which is merely a mountain-torrent, is quite dry or nearly so. The following is a description of the fall in question.

"Pass we at present the beautiful and romantic valley of Mylicer; pass we the fair and culturabed province of Rewsh, its neat capital, washed by the Tonse, and all his unrivalled Falls, and we are now about to descend the Hilliah Pass. But mark you brawling little mountain torrent, famining in its track, which we found it rather difficult, if not dangerous to pass; step fifty yards aside, and you stand upon the verge of a precipice, over which, with one bound, it rushes in unbroken fall, for perhaps two hundred feet, till in its descent it becomes nothing, but one white sheet of foam; while the roaring, crashing and crackling of the buge rocks below bey-pak Erebus, and dripping with spray, look on its tortures, with unalter-mable mien."

"Able men."

Mixapore is a very handsome city, though not one of the first class, in magnitude. It is situated on the right bank of the Gauges about thirty miles above Benares. It is considered the key of the Dukhun, or central part of India, and is a great mart for all sorts o merchandise, more particularly cotton.

XIV.

The signal given, we left the town, And laughed the weary march away, Across the table-land, that lay, Between us, and the Soane ; Rhotass, a moment, saw us pause, * High, frowning o'er the vale, it stands, A fortress formed to freedom's, hands, And worthy of her cause ! But where are those, with hearts so bold, And true, that dare to hold? From thence, we downward tracked the stream, That glittered, in the silver beam Of an eastern queen of night;

That glittered, in the silver beam }
Of an eastern queen of night;

*For an accoung of the magnificent, and I should almost think, impregnable fortress, I beg to refer the reader to the following extract from a tale of fiction, which however is sufficiently accurate, for our seent purpose. It may be as well however toor premise, that the fortress has been for some years unoccupied. It is now utterly described, and its buildings are fast falling to rain and decay.

"An easy march the following moraing brought them to a considerable by any fact the following moraing brought them to a considerable by any fact the following moraing brought them to a considerable by any fact the following moraing brought them to a considerable by any fact the following moraing brought them to a considerable by a strength of the property of the following moraing brought them to a considerable by a strength of the property of the following moraing brought them to a considerable by a strength of the property of the following moraing moraing and the fortie valley, through which it takes it course. No sutuation can possibly be conceived to be more impregnable, and, accordingly, Rhotasghur can be fraced as a place of strength, for upwards of six hundred years before the birth of our Siviour. It is built, not on a mere bilt, but on a burge deached porfion of the highest table-land of India, containing at top, a square area of at least ten miles; on two-thirds of the circumference, it projects into the valley underreath, in bigd, relief, and on the remnuder, it is separated from the adjacent table-land, by a huge cham, or deeply wonded glen, of some miles in breadth, through which a streamlet takes its course. There were but three footpaths, or shall such a stream of the project of the fortree, which led in the top of this vast height, and these were of so about and difficult an nature, as to be almost usuarmonatable of themselves, and utterly to preclude can be almost difficult an antiery, and these were of so about any of the form of a ne

Its streamlets wandering thro' the plain, Amid its isles, seemed some vast chain, Formed, by some magic sleight; We followed, by its crystal waves, By Barcon's Ghaut, to Bhe sh's caves. ⁴ Those temples of a far-past age Dug, in the heart of the living rock, Now echoed, to our lawless rage, And to our impious mock! They were so old, none knew, 'twas said, Their purpose, or when thef were made ; And that may be; but this I know, That, never, did old mother Earth Give, to the day, a ruder birth, Than that lay 'camped, in the plain below, Cleaning their arms, for the coming fray, For close at hand, a city lay; It was my once-loved home, and now I thought me of my wrongs, and vow ! Perhaps, I would have saved !-- but how ? (To be continued.)

WEEKLYANA.

THE London Correspondent of the Indian Spectator has a paragraph on the Times' notice of Mr. Skrine's "An Indian Journalist ?"

"They Indian Affairs? column in the Times this week is mainly occupied with a review of the Life and Letters of Dr. S. C. Mookerjee by Mr. Skrine, the well-known Bengal Civilian. The review is really a concise Biography of the noted Bengal journalist, bringing up all the more essential and significant incidents of his career. This is done, not only in a kindly appreciative spirit, but in such a way as must, for English readers, throw new and interesting side-lights on Hindu life and its more enterprising intellectual aspects. As a characterstudy, and that of a man who went through many vicissitudes—this sketch—as Mr. Skrine's book must be in greater degree—shows Mookerjee in his maturity; hence, it would be instructive for those of your readers who have at hand back numbers of the Indian Magazine and Review to compare with the final result, Mr. Hodgson Plan's high estimate of Mookerjee's chiracter as it appeared to his then Cavilian asperior. Passably, Mr. Skrine's memon, to which attention will be drawn by this notice in the Times; may serve to modify and enlarge our insular estimate as to the value of that bête notre, the Bengali Babu, as a factor in our Indian imperial system. It may be mentioned that the opening para. of this notice glances at the inprovement in the ione and quality of the Indian Speciales.

Unless statements of the Indian Specialer."

The Rijah londed with everence on the eligious sculptures, which surrounded its base, the work of ages too remote, for even traditionary lore. About a mile from this, arose a chain of rocky monotains, constring of huge loose masses of stone, from amongst which, the rains of ages appeared to have "washed away every particle of earth, which had perhaps once given "their form, and consistence.

"They were, in short, the skeletons of mountains. On nearer in spection however, it was found that they were traversed in different places, by strata, in which the unwearied and indefatigable industry of man had hewn out chambers, in the solid rock. There were six or seven of these, made at different places, some of which were as large, "as a spacious apariment. OPINION ON THE BOOK.

It is a most interesting record of the life of a remarkable man.—Mr. H. B ibingion Smith, Private Secretary to the Viceiny, 5th October, K.C.I.E., Director of Public Instruction, Bengal. 26th September, 1895.

It is not that amid the pressure of harassing official duties an English Civilian can find either time or opportunity to pay so graceful a tribute to the memory of a minute personality as F. H. Skirme has done in his hiography of the late Dr. Sainblin Chunder Maokerjee, the well-known Bengal joinnalist (Calcintta Tracker, Spink and Co.); nor are there many who are more worths of being this homomed than the late Editor of Ress and Resyet.

We may at any rate cordially ngive with Mr. Skirme that the story of Mookerjee's life, with all its lights and shadows, is pregnant with lessons for thuse who desire to know the real India.

lessons for thuse who desire to know the real India.

No weekly paper, Mr. Skrine tells us, not even the Hindoo Patriot, in its palinest days moder Kristodas Pal, epipyed a degree of influence in any way approaching that which was soon attained by Reis and Rayyet.

A man of large heart and great qualities, his death from purenuoma in the early spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian purenuoma in the early spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian purenuoma on the early spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian purenalism, and it was an adminable idea on Mr. Skrine's pirt to put lus Life and Letters upon record—The Times of India, (Rombas) September 30, 1805.

It is rarely that the life of an Indian formulative worthy of publication; it is uniterable with the standard and incomper of the Indian Civil Service. But, it has come in pass that no the land of the Bengali Bibia, journalists has been consulered worthy of being written by an Englishman—The Madias Standard, (Madias) September 30, 1895.

The late Editor of Reis and Rayyer was a

The late Editor of Reis and Rayyet was a profound student and an accomplished with a profound student and an accomplished with a who bis left his mark on Tudian journalism. In that he has found a Civilian like Mr Skinne to record the study of his life he is more fortunate than the great Kristodas Pil inself.—The Tribune, (Librare) October 2, 1895.

For much of the biographical matter that For much of the biographical matter that issues so freely from the press an apology is needed. Had no biography of Di, Mooke jer, the Editor of Reis and Rayset, appeared, an explanation would have been looked for. A man of his remarkable personality, who was easily first among native Indian journalists, and in many respects occupied a higher plane than they did, and looked at public affords from a different point of view from theirs, could not an office of the authentication of the processing the second of the processing the second of the processing the second of the processing the pr be suffered to sink into oblivion without some attempt to perpetuate his memory by the usual expedient of a "life." The difficulties common to all biographers have in this case been increased by special circumstances, not the least that the author belongs to a differof which is that the author belongs to a different race from the subject. It is true that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the leanued Doctor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreigners understand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assimilation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mookerjee remained to the lost a Brahman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and approval. In consequence of this, his ideal bingrapher would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathies, and trained like him in Western learning. If Bengal had produced such another man as Dr. Mookerjee, it was he who should have written his life.

Bengal had produced such another man is Dr. Monkeijee, it was he who should have written his life.

The biography is warmly appreciative without being needlessly landatory; it gives on the whole a complete picture of the man; and in the book there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters addressed to Dr. Moneijee are of such minor important that they might have been omitted with advantage, but not a word of his own letters could have been spaged. To say that he writes idiomatic English is to say what is short of the truth. His action is easy and correct, clear and straightforward, without Oriental luxuriance or striving after effect. Perhaps he is never so charming as when he is laying down the laws of literary form to young aspirants to fame. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticism: it is delicate plant-speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a would-be post that his productions are not in the smallest degree poetry, without one may conclude, either offending the youth or teoressing his aidour.

For much more that is well worth reading we minst refer readers to the volume itself. Intrivially it is a hook worth howing and reading.

For much more that is well worth reading we unit refer readers to the volume itself. Intrusically it is a book worth buying and reading. The Pioneer, (Allahabad) Oct. 5, 1895. The career of "An Indian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting. Mookerjee's letters are marvels of pure diction which is heightened by his nervous style. The life has been told by Mr. Skrine in a very pleasant manner and which should make it popular not only with Bengalis hut with all those who are able to appectate merit unmarred by osteniation and earnestness unspoiled by Inrishness.—The Muhammadan, (Madras) Oct. 5, 1895.

The work leaves nothing to be desired either

The work leaves nothing to be desired either in the way of completeness, impartiality, or lifelike portrayal of character.

Mr. Skrine deals with his injeresting subject with the unfailing instinct of the biographer. Every side of Dr. Maokeijee's complex character is treated with sympathy tempered by descriptions.

character is treated with sympathy tempered by discrimination. Mr. Skrine's narrative certainly impresses one with the individuality of a remarkable man. Mookerjee's own letters show that he had not only acquired a command of clear and flexible English but that he had also assumitated that sturdy independence of thought and character which is supposed to be a peculiar possession of natives of Great Butain. His reading and the stores of his general information appear to have been, considering his opportunities, httle less than marvellons. One of the first to express his condidence.

nis opportunities, title tess than marveiloos. One of the first to express his condolence with the family of the deceased writer was the present Viceroy, Lord Elgio. Mokeyee appears to have won the affection not only of the digutaries with whom he came in contact, but also of those in low estate.

The impression left upon the mind apon laying down the book is that of a good and able man whose career has been graphically portrayed.—The Englishman, (Calcutta) October 1. 186 er 15, 1895.

The career of an eminent Bengali editor, who died in 1894, throws a currous light noon the race elements and hereditary influences which affect the criticisms of Indian journalists on British rule.

The "Life and Letters of Dr. S. C. Moo-kerjee," a book just edited by a distinguished civilino to Calcutta, takes us behind the scenes of Indian nutrualism.

of Indian journalism.

It is a narrative, written with insight and a complete mastery of the facts, of how a clever youth gradually grew into one of the ablest leader-writers in Bengal, and still more gradually matured into one of the fairest-minded editors that western education in India has yet produced. If the training and experience which develop the journalist in England are sometimes varied, they seem in India to have an even wider range.

But the object of this notice is to show how a great Bengali journalist is made; space forbids us to enter upon his actual performances. They will be found set forth at sufficient length, and with much felicity of expression, in Mr. Skrine's admirable monograph. It is characteristic of the noble service to which Mr. Skrine's admirable monograph. It is characteristic of the noble service to which Mr. Skrine belongs, that such a book should have issued from its rauks. Dr. Mookerjee was no optimist. One of his brilliant speeches contained the following sentence:—"India has neither the sail nor the elasticity, enjoyed by young and vigorous communities, but present the sail rocks and deserted fees fees has neither the suil nor the elasticity, enjoyed by young and vigorous cummunities, but present the arid rocks and deserts of an effete civilization, hardly stirred to a semblance of life by a foreign occupation dozing over its easily-gained advantages." This was true of the pre-Mutiny Iudia of 1851. If it is no longer true of the Queen's Iudia of 1895, we owe it in no small measure to Indian journalists like Dr. Mookerjee who have laboured, amid some misrepresentation, to quicken the "semblance of life" into a living reality.—The Times, (London) October 14, 1895.

THE SUNYASSEE.

BY JAMES HUTCHINSON.

CANTO THIRD.

In vain, we ride before the blast,
Or trace the long, and weary way,
Without a star, whose cheering ray
May point us, to some haven at last;
The restless mind, without an aim,
Is scorched, at last, by passion's flame,
And we will, vainly, seek for rest,
In sunny lands, and cloudless skies;
Still memory pursues, nor dies,
A hell or heaven, within the breast, ı.

Alone, I trod the desert way, And, scarce, a pathway marked the road; But all was silent, save the neigh Of the distant steed, the traveller rade; Or the Sarus, as he flew o'er head; * Or the mutmur, from some river's hed . Or the tinking of the Bunjarrah's bells, † As he swept, thro' the lone, and wooded dells, His cattle browsing, as they went, The laden was each goodly steer ; Or the belling, from each thicket sent, By herds of wild untended deer ; Or the Jogee, with his matted hair, $ As he muttered, still, his ceaseless prayer : Or the forest monarch's dreadful roar, As he seized his prey, or yelled for more; . I recked them not,-my heart was far away, And sorrowed, as I went, o'er some, long vanished, day. μ,Π.

Years passed away, and, with them, passed The hope of that, to come at last, The long, self-promised, hoped for years Of happiness, undimmed by tears. They came not, as I said before; Perhaps, had sought some unknown shore; But those, who've found them, best can tell The sun-bright clime, in which they dwell ; I found it not !-how could I find Enjoyment, with a tortured mind? And yet, perhaps, my sorrow's force . Had more of sadness, than remorse ; The not all guitless, I could brave-The scarn of living, or the grave But, when I thought of Lilloo's fate Hope told me, it was all too late; That, for the present, all was o'er, And life, a sea, without a shore :-But that were little , -- for I grieve, Not for myself, but her, who died; For her, who, on that fatal eve, For me, was whelmed, beneath the tide. III.

I, now, had none, for whom to live ; No one, to whom 'twere joy to give ; Yet deem not thence, I knew not bliss. The' brief my hours of happiness; Oh I many a stately flower, Arrayed, in woman's fairest charms, Hath decked my lonely bower; Aye ! lam within these arms ; But unesteemed, because unwoodd, They had no power, to soothe my mood, Nor influence enough, to bind Th' affections of a fickle mind; Ah ! no, not fickle ; tho' unwed, My heart was constant to the dead; Yet I have often tried, in vain. To wake my soul, to love, again, As oft, remembrance fresh returned, And, from my breast, the intruder spurned.

And thus, I had no aim, in life;
Then wherefore, still, this reckless strife,
This ceaseless warfare, with my kind,
For happiness, I could not find;
This course of rapine, and of stealth
For what I valued not,—their wealth.

DEAFNESS. An essay describing a really genuine Cure for Deafness, Singing in Ears, &c., no matter how severe or long-standing, will be sent post free.—Artificial Ear-drums and similar appliances entirely superseded. Address THOMAS KEMPE, VICTORIA CHAMBERS, 19, SOUTHAMPTON BUILDING, HOLBORN, LONDON.

^{*} The Sarus is a stately and magnificent bird, of a light slate colour, approaching to a French gray, belonging to the Stock or Crane species. Its call, as it flies over the wild, and wonded tracks of Central India, is very striking and sublime. The Sarus, I believe, is held in great religious veneration, by the Hindoos.

[†] The Bunjarrahs may be said to be the desert merchants of India. They are to be found transversing the wild, and unfrequented tracks of the central parts of the country, with their flocks of cattle grazing, as they go, and laden with grain, cotton, iron, or other articles of unternal traffic. They are generally accompanied by their women, if not by their families. At the end of their day's journey, they pile up their goods, in the form of a rude fortification, the interior of which is occupied by themselves, and their cattle. In times of war, the Bunjarrahs are generally respected, by the contending armies. The nance, I believe, literally signifies, sweepers of the jungle. The tinkling, alluded to in the text, is occasioned, by the bells, which they are in the habit of attaching to the necks of their favourite steers.

1 The forces is one of the orders of titnergat religious medianes.

The force is one of the orders of itinerant religious mendicants belonging to the Hindoo faith.

The perils, and the enterprise, At first, had power to soothe my grief; But grown familiar, with their guise, Tney, long, had ceased to yield relief ;-And could these fail, and sordid gold The gates of happiness unfold? Ah I no. I had enough, and yet, Memory defied me, to forget.

I found, it was a foolish thought, To deem, content could, thus, be bought, Or by aught else, except that love, That bids us, lift our hearts above ; And thus there came, by grace divine, Remembrance of my native vale. And of Bood'h-Gyah's huly shrine; I called to mind its claistered cell, The quiet of each sainted tomb : And thought, if aught could soothe my gloom, It would be, there, to dwell ; And penances,-to rest at last.

And it might be, my sufferings past,

VI.

I spoke, and bade adieu to none, Buf late, one night, I took my way ; None knew, or cared, where I had gone ; Perhaps they sorrowed, for a day, For I was ever first to ride. And skilful too, their course to guide ; But what availed the parting tear, Or bitterer still, the taunt, and jeer ; My purpose ta'en, they could not shake,—
Or hinder it ;—what an awake? VH.

I gained, at length, the well-known pile, And hoped to find, in convent cell, " The quiet, which I loved so well. At first, all nature seemed to smile, /The Fulga's broad, and glassy stream Swept past me, like a fleeting dream ; I saw the craggy ridge extend, And hailed it, as a well-known friend; And faither still,-the lake around, Sn loved, seemed hallo .'d ground ; The very hirds, that wheeled their flight, In mazy cucles, through the an, Hovering, above its vaters fair, Seemed those, that, las , had met my sight. VIII

But Oh ! I could not ! in my eve, Adown the stream, les I should spy Scenes, linked so dark ", with my fate, f That beautifue although they be. DR. M. R. Leverson, Secretary to the Anti-Vaccination Society of America, summarises the four blue books of the British Royal Commission and of the works of Drs. Crookshank, Creighton and Buckly, in these words :-

in these words:—

1st. That vaccination never has prevented and never can prevent an attack of small-pox.

2nd. That it is powerless to modify any such attack.

3rd. That it has maccinated, and is hable to invaccinate syphilis, cancer, leprasy, inherculosis, scrofula and many other diseases.

4th. That the human analogue of cow-pox is syphilis or great pox.

5th. That it is almost certain that vaccination has caused more deaths and diseases than ever has small-pox, whose dangers and tavages have been wickedly exigerated by official quacks.

6th. That Jenner was a merceinty charlatan winse ignorance and impatience of scientific methods were equalled only by his mendacity, in which last habits been imitated by his official followers.

THE following farewell Army order was issued on the occasion of rehuquishing the command of Her Mijesty's Army by the Duke of Cambridge who had held the distinguished position for 39 years, and Her Majesty's commission for 58 years,

"War Office, October 31, 1895.
Field-Marshal H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., relinquishes to-day the dates of the command of Her Majesty's Army, a post of honour and distinction which he has held since July 16, 1856. His Royal Highness has for nearly fifty-eight years held Her Majesty's commission, and he now severs his connection with the active duties of honour and distinction which he has held since July 16, 1866. His Rayal Highness has for nearly fifty-eight years held Her Majesty's commission, and he now severs his connection with the active dutes of his profession with the deepest surface and regret. In relinquishing these dates His Rayal Highness desires a place on record the obligations he is under to all general and other officers who have so uniformly and ably assisted and supported him in maintaining the Army in the high state of discipline and efficiency for which it is distinguished, and he desires to express his deep sense of the admirable conduct, both in the field and in quarters, invariably displayed by offi ers, wair into officers, non-commissioned offi ers, and men of the active Service over whom he has so long presided. The period covering His Royal Highness's command of the Army has been one of great changes. The abolition of purchase, the introduction of short service, of the territorial system, and of improved arms and equipments, have all been materially assisted in their development by the cordial co-aperation of nll ranks of the officers of the Army. The Militia have been brought into claser connection with the Line, the Y-omanny have become far more efficient, and the mistiation of the Volunteer Farce in 1859 marked an important epoch in the expansion of the defensive resources of the Empire. By constant attention to their duties and the desire to perfect themselves in practical knowledge of the military profession all the Auxiliary Forces, including the Volunteers, have become a valuable portion of Her Majesty's Army. In India also most important initiary changes have been effected, commencing with the analgamation of the late of the military profession all the Auxiliary foreign such that Company's troops with Her Majesty's Army in 1866, since which time great changes have been arrived at m many details connected with the Army of India. Company's troops with Her Majesty's Army in 1866, since which time great changes have been arrived a

On his retirement, the Duke has I in honoured with the unprecedented title of Calanel-in-Chief of the British Army. He will besides draw his pay as Field-Marshal under the old warrant obtaining before the abolition of the system of homolary colonelcies, which considerably adds to bis reining allowance,

A royal Duke has been removed from the head of the British army, and no member of the reigning family acceeds him. It is also to be put beyond all control, nonmal as it is, of the Savereign. The Navy has passed out of Her Majesty's han's. Its affairs are administered by the independent Board of Arminalty, "The commissions of nava officers are not signed by the Quee, not is Her Majesty referred to in the appointments and promotions of officers, in the ratification of courts-martial, not is there any such connection between the Crown and the First Lord in regard to the service as existed between the Sovereign and the Communder-in-Chief for the last thirty-nine years at all events." The same change is foresholowed in the new air ingements about the Army. Its affairs will be administered by a Board with a nonroyal Commander-m-Cluef as its head, under the lead of the Secretary of State for War. Here is an echo of the Ridical cry for the abolition of toyalty.

NEXT day, the new Commander-in-Chief Lord Walseley issued the following order:

"In obedience to the gracious order of Her Majesty the Queen, Field-Marshal Viscount Wolseley assumes command of the Land

^{*} There are several religious edifices at Bood'h Gyab, but the one bere more narricularly alluded to, is a college or convent of religious ascetus. I rather think, that they are of the Buddhist laith; at the head of the institution, there is a Molinit, or superior, who on occasious of ceremony goes about as described in the text, attended by twenty, thirty or forty of these brethren, but scannily clad, and armed with sticks on bludgeous. The first appearance of this cortege, even to a person accustomed to the East, is very striking.

[†] It has been already mentioned, that the city of Gyah is only about six noles, further down the stream, than Bood'h-Gyah , both are situated close to the banks of the Fulgo.

Forces of the Crown at home and abroad, in succession to Field-Marshal His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. In this, his first, Army order Lord Wolseley wishes, in the name of the Army, to assume His Royal Highness of the affectionate regard of all who have served under him during his long period of office. It will be Lord Wolseley's endeavour, in the discharge of the high duties now entrusted to him, to contain the great traditions of the British Army, to further the well-being of the soldier, and to encourage the progress called for by the unceasing advance in warlike appha.ccs and in military knowledge which malks this age. The good spirit which animales alike the Regulars, the Milita, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers, is so well known to Lord Wolseley that he confidently relies upon the loyal support of all ranks in his desire to promote the military efficiency of Her Majesty's Army.—By Command of Field-Marshal the Viscount Wolseley, Commander-in-Chief.—Redvers Buller, A.G."

The Duke, who was opposed to many reforms, leaves the Army in a bigh state of discipline and efficiency. The Viscount comes in to introduce reforms and make it a real fighting machine, ready to be used for whatever purpose the nation might require.

THE next Criminal Sessions of the High Court will commence from Wednesday, the 4th of December, Mr. Justice Trevelyan presiding

THE Upper India Chamber of Commerce has re-elected its President Mr. W. E. Cooper as its representative in the Legislative Council of the N.-W. P. and Oudh.

In the Court of the Sessions Judge of Allahabad five men were tried for the death of a pahlwan (wrestler), two being charged with murder and three with abetment of the offence. The three assessors, disbelieving the evidence of the informer, were of opinion that none of the accused was guilty. "In view of the conflicting evidence in the case," the Judge did not think it was necessary for him "to arrive at a different conclusion." The tables have been turned upon the informer, who is under arrest and will be tried for perjury.

THE statue of Lord Reay has arrived at Bombay. It is being erected near that of Sir Richard Temple and will be unveiled by Lord Sandhurst.

"Reis has been wrong in publishing that the Bickaneer Imperial Service Cunel Corps, was the only one of its kind in India, after its inspection by the Viceroy at Futtebur Sikii Litely. There has been a very efficient camel corps of Bhutpur for a long time, though not for Imperial service. I think it was organized by the late Chief after 1870, when he first received provers of administration, notably of the aimy at the onject. It might have been in existence before his time, as Bhutpur, has always been a military chiefship, but he certainly reorganized it with uniform, arms and accountements."

On the 19th November, Rija Vishwanath Singh Bahadoor of Chhatarpur, Bundelkhand, Central India, was invested with the title of Mahataja by Captam Ramsav, Political Agent. There was a Durbar, the Political addressed the Miharaja, the sanad was read and handed over when the Maharaja replied. A feature of the Durbar was that the assembled Thakurs and the officials of the State, one after another, went up to the Political Agent, and each presented him as nazar a gold mohnt which was touched and remitted. On behalf of the State were presented trays of embroidery and Benares cloth, an elephant, a horse, a country matchinck gun and a spear. The last two only were accepted. Was this honour specially done for the occasion, or has it been the practice of the State since the days of Sardar South Sah? If an innovation, the new distinction is a dishonour to the Lord of the World,

THE death of Mr. H. W. Foster, LCS., Registrar of the Midras High Court, is a paniful one. He had just married in England and was on his way to Midras with his bride, when he suddenly died of heart disease in the ir in near Gontakul station on the Southern Marhatta Radway Mis. Foster had hardly realized her married state when she became a widow. How terrible the situation to a Hindu child wife who continues a widow for life!

BARR Process Chunder Shome, of the Subordinate Judicial Service, having retired on pension, is auxious to offer his services to the public in anniher capacity. He has obtained permission of the High Court to practise as a Pleader.

THE District Commad. Courts in Barma will no longer have the assistance of Public Prosecutors. The Chief Commissioner has accordingly reminded the Magistrates that their duty is "to ascertain the facts of the case" and not merely to content, themselves with recording and weighing the evidence before them. In other words, the Magistrates must direct the prosecution and be both the Police and the Judge,

THE academic death, prescribed for Bengali children for possessing, after the first warming, a copy of a book suppressed for scurrilous atticks on the Government, is not so light an affur in England. Jurists, both bacharous and civilised, are agreed that children, like the king, can do no wrong. Those conversant with the Mahabharata know how the grow Judge of the Infernal regions, the mighty Yama himself, was huiled down from his palace and office and forced to take bith in the lowest of the four orders of human beings on the earth, for the punishment be had the foolishness to inflict on the Rishi Mandavya for an offence committed in childhood. Mandavya was a powerful ascetic, possessed of wealth of penances and fully competent to impose his will on Yama. The Indian Penal Code has exempted children from criminal liability, but there is nobody to notice the prank of a provincial Secretariat when, in its wisdom, it thinks fit to legislate by an executive order and create, in the very teeth of the Penal Code, not only a new offence, but provide for it the heaviest penalty. Clever as our Secretaries are, their knowledge of the law is neither extensive nor deep. One of them who may be taken as a fair specimen of the class, some years ago, surprised a colleague of his on the managing Board of a metropolitan Library by his unfamiliarity with English anthors by no means unknown to the advanced students of Indian Colleges. He had not heard that the delightful philosophical egotist, Montaigne, the father of a new species of literature, the great exemplar of Add son and Steele and Juhuson, had been Englished, Florio and Charles Cotton were names of no significance to him. The same official, on another occasion, stared at the mention of Jeffrey, the father of nineteenth century criticism, and enquired what he had written. Sydney Smith, in noticing an erroneous decision on poaching, recommended Beccaria on Crimes and Punishments to one of the greatest Judges of England. We may, without offending, recommend to the Secretariat a perusal of the judgment of Lord Camden in what is known as Shipley's case. Shipley was a young man of a respectable family. Possessed of talents and great freedom of thought, he had written some essays in which the good dons of his university discovered all manner of evil. They charged him with heresy, immorality, and what not, and convicted him in solemn conclave, without having granted him a hearing, and pronounced sentence of expulsion and academic death. If it were India, such sentence would have been irrevocable. But in England no one is above the law. Shipley appealed to the Lord Chancellor and keeper of the Great Scal as representing the Sovereign In his capacity of visitor of the College. It is a domestic tribunal, but the forms provided by the wisdom of ages for ensuring correctness of decisions prevail in it in full force. Lord Camden set aside the sentence of the learned dans and read them a sharp lecture for presuming to judge a fellow man without having given him an opportunity for defence. The biographer of Lord Camden was at some pains for obtaining a copy of that judgment and preserving it for future reference. Lord Campbell says that to the end of his life, the great Chancellor regarded it with approbation. The following extracts from the precious deliverance may be read with interest and delight by all whose minds have not been seared by an unchecked and long practice of official tyranny.

"The appellant, Shipley, a young man at the University, had been expelled from his College for the supposed offence of publishing a finel, aggravated, as his accusers and judges chose to say, by his being guilty of "general mount dity." Fire College, being a royal foundation, he appealed to the King, as Visitor. The appeal was heard by Lord Camden, Lord Chancellor, who said : -

' The purisdiction is exercised in the right of the King, as Visitor. It is, in its nature, very peculiar. It is a despotism uncontrolled, and without appeal; the only one of its kind which is known in this Kingdom.

"I contemplate with pleasure so numerous an assembly, as there is no restraint upon the Visitor but his own character.

'Not considering here the map at of the evidence, I shall pronounce that Mr. Shipley was condenined unheard, and without such previous tital as natural justice required. Waether my first, was proved against him or no, is not, in this view of the subject, in iterial. Such a mode of pinceeding is never to be pastified or dlowed by a Jurige. It is a natural principle of justice engined innon the heart-not acquired by book-learning-that no one is to be condemned inflientd.

'I could wish that persons who are intrusted, for ingennous purposes, with a despatic power over youth, would understand the first principles of justice. Were it a case of ordinary discipline, or of customary punishment, I should, in this domestic forum, thin a very deaf ear to complaint, though, as representing the royal visitor, I can severse any act. I should wish, in all such cases, to leave the governors of a college almost absolute. But in the case of expulsion, I wish for temper, and I must have it, for I must claim it. That p nishment is extreme. It is capital. It inflicts academic death.

An independent member of a College is, by this mark upon him, sent home degraded, stript of his degrees, and of advantages in certain professions. He comes into the world introduced by odium of chiracter. I should expect that a proceedur, to be attended with soch consequences, should be regularly instituted, should be conducted with temper, sound he comported by solid proof, and be satisfictory to ad reasonable minds ""

YESTERRIAY, there was a Durbar at Belvedere. It was the last of Sir Charles Eduat's. The occasion was, as the carl of manation, printed in gold probably to lend additional dignity to the ceremony but unreadable, especially at night, says, "the investiture of certain gnotlemen on whom titles have been conferred by His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General of India". The card contained the name of the block and the number of the seat set apart for the invited. It, however, give no plan of the durbar hall for you to know where your seat was. It was misleading in another way, showing no indication of all that was done at the Darbai. A surprise was reserved for the visitors. The gentle men invested, and they are no more for the titles conferred, are

- r. Rijoh Binaya Kushna Deb, of Savahazar, Calcutta.

The proceedings, after the much of the Lieutenant-Governor preceded by Chopdars and his aids-de-comp and followed by his Private Secretary and Secretaries and Under-Secretaries to the Government of Bengal, opened not with conferment of the similar fittes, but with another and different matter in which His Honor has no jurisdiction. The programme even as published in the Englishman of the previous morning makes no allusion to it, verifying the truth of our remark. The first to be introduced to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in Durhar, So Coarles Ethott sat in no other capacity, was the Houble Ray meswar Prosad Sing Billidoor of Gidhour robed as a Knight Commander of the Indian Empire. Two warrests were read by the Chief Secretary, one appointing him a Knight, and the other dispensing with personal investince, then the Lieutenani-Governor primed the star on the Knight's be est and addressed him. The warrant uself gives and grants unto "a R -vaneswar "full power and authority to we ii and use upon the left side of his upper vestment the Star and also to wear and use the Riband and Badge appertaining unto a Knight Commander." It has been e plained that the Maharaja was anxious to receive his new honous at the hands of Sir Charles. That can hardly justify the part a simed by S r Charles Elliott. He was only to be the bearer of the warrants, the Jusigma and the Budge, but he chose to act the G and Master as he did, his Chief Secretary abetring the illegality and the other Knights and Companionof the Order present all ling it improtested. Khim Bihidin Ahdul Jubban was similarly invested with the insignia of a Companion of the seme Order, and ologised for his services to the Givernmen which would not make I in Inspector-General of Registration that he might retire as such. The holders of Indian titles for whom the Duchar was held next of med the Lieutenant-Governor's attention The sanads were banded over. The two Rijas were addressed to separately and the rest disposed of en masse.

AT the Wanowrie rifle range, Poona, on the morning of November 18, a Sepay of the 7th B mbay Infantry ran amuck, and killed four men including hunself. After firing from 200 yards, while advancing to 300, he commenced to run wildly about, threatened an ex-Sub dar-Major of his own regiment-a retired pensioner-who had sauntered up to the range, and shot him dead with the loaded rifle, when the Havildar of the regiment went forward to seize him. He too was fired at and killed instantly. Then the infuriate man of war began to fire indiscriminately. It was now the turn of Lieutenant Riddell, of the 4th Bumbay Rifles, who was acting for the range officer, to attempt the arrest and be killed. Finding him advance, the Sepoy warned the Captain not to come near him. To prevent further mischief, the officer tried to approach when he received a shot in his arm, Another desperate stringgle with the wounded arm, and another shot, at which the Cipiam felt. The Sophy then can 300 yards, reloaded his rifle for his own destruction, took off, his boots, then took his own, life, He had been a Jentidir and been reduced to a Sepov, for which he bore a gordge against the two native officers he koden. The man had evidently been smarring under the rojustice as he took it. He had no intention of killing the Empress officer but was driven to the deed in the madness of the hom; nod when he found that he had committed a wrong, he prinished miniself and went, the way of all his victions. The tragedy is a waroing to all to be just and to administer justice in a way that it may not be felt as an injustice. Of late, are not such justinces in illiplying? The Sepoy was a Sikh by religion. What could be the meaning of his taking off the boots? Was it, as since reported, only to facilitie the act of self-destruction by holding his implement more tightly, or was it the desire of freeing himself from a contaminating substance at the last moment when bent upon making the voyage to eternity?

TUESDAY last, Sir Charles Edbott, accompanied by his Private Secretary, went to Seebpore for inspecting the new bridge at Shahmar. The Magistrate of Howish, Mr. Grierson, was in attendance, with Babin Gopal Lal Soal who has met the entire cost of the construction coming up to Rs, 33,000. Sir Charles expressed. satisfaction at the work and thioked the donor in the name of the local public. This is a fair start. We hope Baba Seal will soon recover last ground.

THE Sulav Dainik, a metropobian Bengali daily, invites attention to what it regards a joinbery in the Controller's branch of the Postal Department. A Superintendent drawing Rs. 200 has been promoted, over the heads of many seniors, to officiate in a post of Rs. 900. It is not the appointment so much that the Daink objects to as the conduct of the offi er favoured. Houself unfamiliar with his duties, he inflicts fines for trivial errors. MR. Mr. Radioe at the time he wrote this judgment, had no more power to write it or do any other work as Joint Magistrate of Mymensing than any privite individual. Saturday, November 30, 1805. TITULAR DISTINCTIONS IN INDIA.

In former days there were no periodical issues of what is now called the Honors' List. It is now Gazetted twice a year with great regularity. It is an innovation which time has brought in its train. The practice is, no doubt, deserving of praise, of rewarding honomable and accomplished, and even wealthy, inembers of society for enlightenment and public munificence, as also servants of the State for valuable services rendered to the Sovereign. A break, however, is noticeable in the policy that used to regulate the bestowal of honours. During the early days of British rule, titles were never conferred after the manner of the present times. Then, instead of any new titles, only such as were enjayed, by courtesy or under the sanction of the old Mussulm in Government, by scions of the Linded aristocracy were recognised. Generally, the recognition took place on the succession of the eldest member of the house to the headship of the family In Bengal, hous a like those of Burdwan, Bunwaribad (Beerbhoon), B. tti di, Hutwa, Doomraon, Shapur (Champaria), Pacher (Manbhoom), Gangpore (Chota-Nagpur), Bhockeylish (24 Perginas), all enjoyed the respective titles of their families, from Maharajadhiraj, Ameer-ul Mooil, Nizumut-ud-Dowlah, to Maharaja and Raja Bahatar. None of these honorific distinctions was created by the British Government. Originally bestowed by the Mussulman Government. they were inherited by the eldest members of the houses on their succession to the family estate. The British had the wis lom to recognise them when new successors came in. Among members of untitled houses the first recipient of honour from the present rulers was Nobokissen who had render-Kally Kissen, when the title was conferred on his son, Harendra Krishna, in 1874, it was considered to be hereditary, although titles in India could not be so under the resolution of the Government of India, in the Foreign Department, of May 1820, and according to the sense of the despatch from Lord Canning, dated December 1859, to the Secretary of State. If we mistake not, when the title of Maharaja Bahadur was conferred on the successor of Maharaja Mahatap Chand Bahadur of Burdwan during the administration of Sir Ashley Eden, the Bengal Government, in recommending the bestowal, urged on the Government of India that it should not be hereditary. If such was the intention of Government in the case of a landed house like Burdwan, it is a strong precedent against those new men who having obtained a title aspire to perpetuate it in their families. Before the mutiny, titles were very sparingly conferred. The descendants of Dewan Gunga Govind Sing were for many years without any titular distinction. Pratap Narain Sing did not obtain the stamp of aristocracy before 1854, although Paikpara was one of the biggest and most important houses in metropolitan Bengal.

The mutiny brought about a change in the policy of title-giving as of many other measures of administra-The British Government had to reward those that had rendered invaluable services during the dark days of the Sepoy rebellion. A perfect show-er of honors was poured by the first Viceroy of the Crown. From that time a new disease has appeared in the country, called the title-fever. It has spread all over the land. A large number of persons has been attacked by it. In their struggle for honorific distinctions, they assume virtues which they have not. The help is sought of the inferior newspapers of the country. The hard-earned money of stingy ancestors is freely spent, the chief object being to win the good will of the District executive. In this way, many works of public utility have been given to the country. Schools and hespitals have been founded or subsidised. New rouls and causes have been laid and excavated. The very Zoological gardens of Government have received accessions in the form of either new buildings for the shelter of old faint or new specimens added to the collections. When the Orissa famule made its appearance, one of the Calcutta Baboos fed a cert on number of beggars, He was, for this, recommended for the title of Rija Bahadur, in the name of the Lieutenant-Governor who had then left the country, by the Secretary who was an intimate friend of the Baboo. It was urged on his behalf, that he was closely related to one that had been made a Raji Bihadar, so that there was no chance of the distinction being lowered in the public estimation. Thus was his admission facilitated into the new order of nobility created by the Government. It should be noted, however, that the gentleman in question has taken the lead in the town in the matter of munificence to the hungry poor. More than five hundred persons of both sexes and all ages are still fed by his heirs every day. The instances are many of other admissions into the titled aristocracy of persons that distinguished themselves by liberal expenditure on the occasion of the Orissa and the later famines that have visited the country. ed valuable services in the early days of the East Indeed, it was since the Orissa famine that the India Company. Nobokissen's family still enjoys the honour as a hereditary one. In the line of Sir one can aspire to some sort of distinction by only Raja Radha Kant Deb Bahadur, the title of Raja creating an interest with the D strict officers, worth Bahadur has also been hereditary. In that of being only a secondary consideration. It is high time some restrictions were placed on conferring If the Chief Secretary to the Bengal Government titles as on the bestowal of public appointments. It is to be regretted that several persons have been admitted into the rank of Raja or Nawab who ought not to have been admitted for more than one reason. A foreign Government, however, that is not in touch with the people, can hardly be blamed for errors of Ot late, public munificence has come to be regarded as the sole qualification for admission into the titled aristocracy. By this is meant liberal contributions in behalf of the fads of officials in power. Lady Dufferiu's fund has been the occasion of the making of many Rajas and Nawabs. The Lowis Sanitarium at Darjeeling. a really useful institution, has made one or two. The Howrah Town Hall has given us some Rai Bahadurs. Even a benefaction for housing a little school at Calcutta named after a Secretary to the local Government, promises to give us a Maharaja unless the superior authorities scrutinize the recommendation with care. Of schools there was already a fungus growth in the metropolis, so that the one founded and christened after the Secretary could scarcely be regarded as needed. The benefaction, again, has been guarded by a clause about reversion of the gift to the donor or his heirs in case the institution comes to a demise. But Secretaries are not so big as Lieutenants of Provinces and they are thankful for small mercies.

The procedure of Raja-making is very simple. The District officer must report a person favourably, One must cultivate friendly relations with him if ambitious of being a titled subject. There are hundreds of ways by which to ingratiate oneself into the good graces of the District celestial. He has his fads, and one need only contribute liberally for their accomplishment. The next deity to be gratified is, of course, the Divisional Commissioner. That task, however, is not so difficult. Partly, the District officer tikes it upon himself to smooth the path. But if there is any obstruction, the District officer advises the aspirant as to what he should do. The Commissioner's acquiescence being se cured, the rost is easy wilking. The local Governments are bound to report favourably on that has been strongly recommended by the Division al Commissioner. The recommendations of the local Governments go up to the Foreign office. The Viceroy is himself his Foreign Minister; so that it is the Vicerov who, in consistation with his Private Secretary, does the rest, that is, orders the melusion of the candidate's a rate in the Honors List. Both the Viceroy and the Privite Secretary have very little personal knowledge of the individuals honoured. But the absence of personal knowledge is no bar in such a case. A Kumar whom the Vicciov hesitated to grant a provate interview for fear of opening the door wide, was unaned rely Gozetted a Raja. The language of the recommendations by the local Governments is carefully considered. Very generally, dever Secretaries win the day

Altogether, it is a question of wordpainting. There is one estimable feature in the procodure, and that is that no Secretary, or Lieutenant-Governor, or Governor, is allowed to interfere with the choice by personal solicitations of any kind, after the report has gone up to the Viceroy. In fact, none of them has the means to know who among the reported batches will succeed unless informed by the Viceroy's Private Secretary.

THE SPLIT IN THE CONGRESS CAMP.

THE DISPUTE OVER THE PAVILION,

THE contention at Poona regarding the use of the Congress pavilion, after the Congress, for the Social Conference, is not the fruitless squabble that philosophic indifference may choose to take it. Both sides are in earnest, and when both sides have so many intelligent men to lead them, the dispute demands a thorough examination. The Mahratta Brahmans, who are unwilling to place the pavilion at the dis-posal of the Social reformers, have voiced the sentiments of a large class. Managed as the Social Conference is, its resolutions, they maintain, are not worth the paper on which they are written, so far as the main body of the people is concerned. The reformers, whatever their reputation for intelligence and culture, are men of little or no social influence. They have, it is urged, broken with that society which they seek to reform. They are certainly at liberty to meet together, denounce the customs of orthodox society by argumentative speeches, and record their resolutions on paper for the use, as their opponents would say, of philantheopists in England. What the opposition wants is that they should not bring the Congress, which is a political justitution, into disrepute with the main body of the people, The use of the Congress paymon for venti-lating social questions, it is feated, is very likely to make the Congress uself auponed as in the eyes of orthodox society by connecting it even vaguely with a movement against the entiting order of things. Hindu Sweety is essentially conservative. It has set its tace against widow-marriage. The exertions of of Indian philauthropists in that direction, have not borne a Equate tonic. Considering the money and the energy spent, the result achieved is sourcely calculable. Even if the reformers be held to have the best of the unument in their favour, that has served them hade. Right or wrong, the legislation of the Reshis, as understood by the country in general, is not likely to be soon given up. Those, therefore, that have not yet attained the degree of culture involved to indulgence of torbidden food and drink, in macrying daughters and sisters out of their own orders, in providing husbands for their widowed kinswomen, and in making journeys to foreign lands under circumstances incompatible with the observance of caste rules, shrink to take any step that may confound the Congress with a movement against religion and caste. India, they argue, wants many things. The programme of the Congress is a political and not a social one. There is nothing to prevent men who have not broken with religiou and caste from meeting those who have, on the common platform of political reform. The Hindu, observing the externals of his faith-adoring his sacred fire and saying his twilight and midday prayers after the manner of his Vedic ancestors, feels no hesitation in working with any number of denationalised members of his own race, or, for that matter, with even Mussulmans and Englishmen, for winning new liberties for his country from the reluctant hands of his rulers. He feels that if he is to hope for success, he must enlist in his cause all corners irrespective of their dress, surroundings, or nationality. All differences may be sunk for accomplishing the common design. He is even willing, for the sake of the cause, to surrender himself, if need be, to the lead of those who differ from him in social customs and religion. He cannot, however, allow that his temporary disregard of all differences for a particular purpose should be availed of by those with whom he mixes, for making it appear that he means more than he actually does. The liberal electorate, he urges with great does. The liberal electorate, he urges with great plausibility, comprising Christians of all de-nominations, of an English borough, may meet together as brethren for electing a liberal member for Parliament. But the electors, after their legitimate proceedings are over, can hardly allow any section of theirs to exhibit in the same place theological rancour against the rest of the people. A Methodist may combine with an Episcopalian, and both with a Calvinist or Lutheran, for taking into consideration. the intelligence of a destructive famine in an Indian province. But can the Methodist and the Episcopalian quietly permit the same organisation that has called the meeting to the Calvinist or Lutheran for denouncing Methodism and Episcopacy? If this is allowed, will not future meetings be impossible when called for common ends? Even this is the situation at Poona as understood by the orthodox section of that town. They are unwilling to permit the organisation that calls the Congress from being availed of by a portion of the Congressists for the exhibition of rancour against their customs and religion.

It is not very clear why the promoters of the Social Conference should be so eager for the Congress pavilion. As a matter of fact, the number of delegates actually taking apart in the Conference is very small, the main body having nothing to do with it. The few that dieuss social reform and record their resolutions, may very well afford to meet on a different occasion and in a different place. Elaborate arrangements are scarcely needed for bringing them together or for lodging them. They are, again, men of note who have achieved success in their respective professions. It cannot inconvenience them much or even at all, if they have to assemble a second time at a different place. Their persistence creates a very unfavourable impression. would seem that unwilling to work single-handed as they have always done, little recking the abuse daily showered on their heads by ignorance and faction, they wish to act under new auspices, expecting prestige and influence from the place and occasion of their meeting. They attach importance to the subject before them. To publish their deliberations widely and get as many converts as possible, are motives not ignoble. Excluding the few fanatical busybodies that now and then invoke the aid of legislation, with the generality of them even these are the only approved means of success. They must educate Indian opinion. voke the aid of legislation, with the generality of them even these are the only approved means of success. They must educate Indian opinion. To thrust, however, their company upon men shrinking from that honour, is not very honourable. The promoters of the Conference, it is said, wish to stand or fall by a plebiscitum of all the standing Congress committees in India. They are unwilling to give way at the opposition of the Poona Committee, Regrettable as the dispute is in consequence of the angry feelings it has already excited, the question, however, should be settled once

After the above was in type, intelligence reaches us of the dispute having ended. The promoters of the Conference will not ask for the loan of the Congress pavilion.

THE PILGRIM SHIPS ACT.

Lord Elgin has extricated himself from a difficult position. Lord Elgin has extricated himself from a difficult position. Six weeks ago we called attention to the outery in the Indian Press, European and Native, against the Pilgrim Ships Bill, and to the memorial in which the Bombay Mussulmans had formally embodied their protest. That protest amounted to a declaration that the Bitish Government was, in spite of the Queen's solemn pledges, interfering with the religious observances of the people, and was converting pilgrimage, which forms a spiritual obligation on all Mahomedans who can accomplish it, into a luxury for the rich alone. The objectors also pointed out that the Vicerov. for the rich alone. The objectors also pointed out that the Viceroy, by the proposed Pilgrim Tax for the benefit of Turkey, was being made a catspaw for levving one of the most odious imposts known to the East. Lord Elgin's difficulty was intensified by the two facts that the Bill contained provisions which even the Minister in charge of it could not defend, and that it was the result of a compulsion which he could not with propriety avow. The normal process of legislation in India is simple and effective.

A provincial Government finds that some class of the community is suffering from grievances, or has developed new conditions with which the existing law fails to deal. It accordingly applies to the Government of India for legislation. The Supreme Government in sits executive capacity scrutinizes the alleged necessity for a new law, earefully testing the evidence in correspondence with the provincial Government which has moved in the matter, and with other of the local administrations in which the same problem is likely to arise. If satisfied of the necessity the Suprem-Government then proceeds in its legislative capacity to bring in a Bill. In doing so it places before the Legislature and the Indian public a detailed history of the steps taken to ascertain that the proposed measure has its origin in the actual wants of the people, and that it really meets those wants. The Legislative Council then refers the Bill for the criticism of the provincial Goy-Council then refers the Bill for the criticism of the provincial Governments, or of those of them whose population can possibly be affected by its provisions. Various public bodies and recognized associations throughout India are also con lited. A select committee of the Legislative Council goes de to through the whole evidence thus collected, and, if needfal, manifes the Bill so as to bring it into absolute accord with the fiets. Any mamber of the Legislature who thinks that this has not been thoroughly done, or who suspects that the true history of the measure has not been disclosed, gets an opportunity for very data-zing criticism at the session of Council held to pass the Bill into 1 v.

The history of the Pilgrim Ships Act exhaust the antithesis of this process. The indignation which it excited and the flatte in which it has ended were due not to the inherent folly of its proposals alone, but also to the conviction through at India that those proposals were not made in the interests the population to be affected by them. A convention sat in Pari, at which India was very inadequately represented, to consider the means for arresting the spread of cholera from Arabia to Europe. Under pressure from the Foreign Office in London, a draft measure was sent out to India to give effect to the proposals of the Paris convention-some of them ludicrously ansaitable to Indian Mahomedan pilgrims. As Indian pilgrimage to Atabia had already be in regulated by a careful series of enactments based upon the local tacts, fresh legislation was required if the existing law were to be superseded by the doctrinaire devices of the Paris convention. Government found it impossible to bring the devices before the Indian Legislature without exciting a popular agitation and courting a public defeat. The Indian Government accordingly remonstrated with the Secretary of State against the dangerous and unjust provisions of the Bill. Its remonstrance, while temperate in tone, was convincing in its arguments. It was supported, we understand unanimously supported by the Secretary of State's own Council at Westminster. But the ment, he disregarded also the opinious of his own Council, and despatched to India a mindate for immediate legislation. We do not care to reproduce the adjectives of indignation with which that mandate has been denounced by the Indian Mussulmans and by the whole Indian Press.

The embarrassments of the Indian Government were further increased by the attitude of Turkey. The Government of India which is by far the largest Mussulman Power in the world, we being spurred on by imperious orders from home to a course of action certain to arouse widespread and possibly fanatical discontent among its Mahomedan subjects. Meanwhile the Ottoman Sultan, who has pretensions of being the Commander of the Faithful, looked on with lay indifference and enjoyed the prospect of the British Government embroiling itself with its 57 millions of Mussulmans. It was stated that the Sultan had not even ratified the proposals of the Paris convention which were to be forced the throats of the Indian Mahomedans, and that there was little likelihood of their ever being really carried out by his officers. Fortunately, while the Indian Government was struggling at its distasteful and almost impossible task, a change of Ministry took distasteriii and aimost impossible task, a enange of bumbery cook place in England. Lord George Hamilton, with chivalrous consideration towards his predecessor, and with that regard for the continuity of government on which Lord Salisbury laid stress at Warford last week, hesitated to intervene. But the importance of the case, and the protests and remonstrances from India, compelled him to go into the matter. The pressure upon the Indian Government was removed, and Lord Elgin was left to find his way out as best he could from the false position into which he had been driven.

His Home Minister and the Select Committee of the Legislative

His Home Minister and the Select Committee of the Legislative Council proceeded scientifically to draw the teeth and cut the claws of the Bill. Having rendered it comparatively harmless, they further deprived it of effective vigour by turning it into "an enabling" Act. That is to say, the law was not to come into force until the Governor-General thought fit, and he received powers to recast some of its most important rules. We have said that the process he which the Polorius Shine Bill was coulded was not the process by which the Pilgrim Ships Bill was evolved was not in accordance with the normal method of Indian legislation. A new Indian law is ordinarily the outcome of the local needs of an Indian community. It is arrived at by a slow inductive process, during which the evidence for the necessity of the measure is scrutinized, first by the Government of India in its executive capacity, and then by the Select Committee of the Legislative Council. Each step in its history is frankly disclosed to the Indian Legislature. The Pilgrim Ships Bill did not even pretend to be based upon the wants of the Indian population. Instead of being arrived at by a slow inductive process in India it was avowedly the result of à priori conclusions arrived at on the other side of the globe. So far from its detailed history being openly stated to the Legislative Council, every member knew that there had been secret influences at work.

In this experimenting on the forbearance of the Indian Legisla-ture we play with edged tools. The Act of Parliament passed during Lord Salisbury's last Ministry gave to the In him Legisla-tive Council powers which it did not before possess. It is dangerous to treat a Legislature which has become a reality as if it were a sham. Occasions may arise, for example, on great questions of finance, when the Indian Legislature must accept the deliberate policy of the British nation. But the very fact that the Indian constitution is hable from time to time to sai h tension makes it the more unwise to subject it to needless strain .-- The Times.

REMINISCENCES OF DR SAMBITUC, MOOKERIEE

BY ONE WHO KNEW HIM.

THUS Anglo-Indian journalists are not the men likely ever to truly appreciate Sminan Chander or his writings and it their brief obiturry notices of this "Prince of Indian journalists" contain a word or two of appreciation of his many ments, that is but indicative of the feeble reawakening of a smothered and diseased conscience. It would not be well or graveful, however, not to mention in this connection that the late Robert Knight fully recognized the worth of Sambhu Chunder and the Stateman used to contain every now and again long and eloquent leading articles in appreciation of writings in Ris and Rayyet which Mr. Knight used to call a truly wonderful organ. Mr. Knight and Sambhu Chunder were afterwards friends and Mr. Knight considered it an honour to enjoy his friends company. So highly did Mr. Knight estimate Sunbhu Chunder's literary artainments that on one occasion Sambhu Chunder having asked him amont something of ancient English custom Mr. Knight exclaimed "You make me blush, Dr. English custom Mr. Knight exclaimed "You make me blush, Dr. Mookerjee. Farning to the members of the Anglo-Native journalism in Bengal, we do not know what is say. They have given evidence of an unworthy spirit in reference to Doctor Sambhn Chunder's death which has given us very deep pain. How Sambhu Chunder has deserved only a dozen lines and even less of notice on his death is what passes our comprehension. If the politics of Sambhu Chunder and those of other native journalists were at the aniipodes, as one of our contemporaties expresses 11, the latter might have criticised his politics at length along with recording other builliant points in Sambhu Chunder's character and personality which were more or less known to them. But it is useless arguing in this strain with men who have acted in this connection with a purpose. that purpose may be, we have no inclination to examine. of the metter is that the selfish aprit which at present pervades journalism in Bengal has developed a heartlessness which seems to have choked the expression of any real feeling of maganimity, or even a tolerably keen vense of justice. The words of Mr. Malabari the Editor of the Indian Speciator are still ringing in our ears. On the first occasion that a friend of ours met him, he asked in course of conversation, if Dr. Sambhu Chunder was truly appreciated by his own countrymen in Bengal, and when our friend said that he was not so much appreciated as he ought to be, Mr. Malabari's surprise knew no bounds. "What, Sir!" exclaimed the accomplished journalist, "do you mean to say you exclaimed the accomplished parameter, and exclaimed the appreciate that brilliant man of Ren and Rayyet? This fact only shows that Bengal is not a whit more advanced than Bombay. Why, Sir, if Sambhu Chunder was born in Bombay, he would have been simply worshipped. There is none like him in all India, assure you. He is a man whom we can set against the whole West, mind yon, in any literary controversy. He is one of our invaluable ornaments---an ornament of which all India may well be proud. Just send him over here if you can somehow, my friend, and we will show you what reception we greet him with!" But Mr. Malabari forgot that Bengal was not liberal-minded Bombay, but only self-seeking Bengal and that even this self-seeking is as much a vice in ordinary mortals as in our pretentious patriots and tall-talking public teachers. Can any of our high-stepping patriots and an extraction product can be a clear as was Samblu Chunder's? Well, we need not anticipate the right answer. Can any of our patriots say that his criticism of governmental measures and policy was as featless and hard-litting as was Samblu Chunder's? No, even in his greatest mistakes, Sambhu Chunder could never be charged by any same man with dishonesty or acting against his conscience. So pronounced indeed, were his unsulled honesty and conscientiousness that nobody dured ever call them in question. Mistakes, of course, he had many, because he was human, but his writings even under such mistaken views betrayed a simplicity of heart and honesty of mind which were really praiseworthy. His unhappy support of the Age of Consent Bill was a source of great pain to us as we had to range ourselves against his side. But we believed in them as we believe it still, that he was wheelled into assuming that attitude by men who had personal interest in supporting the Government. His health was always bad and grew at times worse and this was the opportunity snaiched to cloud his usually clear vision. The supporters of the governmental policy were far from the representative and the accession into their ranks of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Monkeyee my seed their ignoble cause with the only respectability it could be ist of.

Dr. Sambhu Chunder had no sympathy for the National Congress movement, not because he had no sympathy with the a putations of his constrym in to secure a larger share in the indinivistration of their own country, not because he did not wish the wrongs of his countrymen to be righted. Nothing was faither from his mind. The reason of his beeping about from the Congress movement was to be found in another quarter. A Conservative by birth and instincts, he hated all Radical notions. He had no patience for English Ridical theories or their had initiations by his own countrymen, theories which sought to place the patricity on the same footing with the plaberan, to make the jimee and the peasant of one and the same rank. The very idea of such an act was, to him, a violation of an All-wise God's dispensation who has created man and beast, buds and trees, all at the same time. As no two men can be found to be equal in any respect, no two men can claim to share equal tank or equal privileges. Conceived in diversity, neither the creation nor the laws of the world can bestow equality on all created beings. The claim of the peasant to be considered equal with the prince is simple blasphemy. Imbued with these solid ideas, he always discountenanced such about notions and theories. He had no love, therefore, for the systems modern constitutional Government with its system of election by sheer dint of votes. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee was much too conservative and too wise a philosopher to accept the adoption conservative and to a melioration of his own country and his countrymen whose loyalty is in their blood and whose very blood cries out for a king to follow, obey, worship and die for. And yet cries out for a king to 1010000, oney, worsnip and die for. And yet none felt more keenly the grievances of his countrymen in respect of their legitimate claim to higher appointments under the State. But he did not think that the method of the National Congress was the right method to demand the fulfilment of their aspira-

But it is upon the personal and private virtues of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee that the curiosity of the future biographer of Bengal's worthy sons will be proud to dilate. Dr. Mookerjee at home would supply him with a theme of almost romantic interest. Upstairs the parlour house of the Wellington Square Dutt family is a small room which is furnished more with an eye to usefulness than ornamentation, and yet it was the best ornamented Editor's sanctum in all Calcutta. Here in this room would sit Dr. Sambhu Chunderits best ornament, lighting up the room and furniture with his intellectual halo. None entered this room without feeling the influence of his charming presence, for none who entered it set his influence of his charming presence, for none who entered it set his eyes upon him without being filled with awe which hedges in true greatness. Nor was this awe of the sublime unmixed with the loveliness of the beautiful. In fact, the sublime and the beautiful vied with each other in his character and the internal struggle expressed itself in his external appearance. But Sambhu Chunder's singularly intellectual qualifications were set off by his handsome personal features. There was a harmonious blending of internal and external beauties in his personality which altogether formed and external beauties in his personality which altogether formed an attraction that was too powerful for one who came in personal contact with him to resist. His character was in his face inscribed in God's own hand. His large eyes out of which twinkled forth the nild light of kindness and sincerity, his regular nose, his well-formed mouth and well-rounded chin crowned with his ample forehead and head of flowing hair which shaded and set off the effect of his olive complexion, joined to a well-proportioned size, body and limbs were no mean contribution to the attractions of his body and limbs were no mean contribution to the attractions of his personality. Everything with Sambhu Chunder was an art, speech or thought or action, an art which was the outward expression, as he would say, of the science of truth. Philosopher from his birth, he regarded nothing however trivial, with a light heart. Wholehe regarded nothing however trivial, with a light heart. Whole-hearted to the backbone, he never believed in indifference to any thing in God's creation. If his movements were artistic, from a gentle wave of the hand to a slight toss of the head, it was the gentic wave of the mand to a might took of the nead, it was the result of a mental culture and an intellectual discipline which sought to restore man to his natural divinity. His conception of what a man should be was far too idealistic for a work-a-day world

But these were only the outward signs of Dr. Mookerjee's highly developed qualities of head and heart. Few men in India are so well-versed as Sambhu Chunder was in Western lore and the range of his studies covered all branches of knowledge. He never fitted with knowledge. His study was always thorough. Whatever he took up for perosal, he would begin from the beginning and end took up for perusal, he would begin from the beginning and end with the end. He would read the title, the inner title and the preface of a book before entering into its subject matter. Bad, good or indifferent, no author could complain of his inattention or half dealing with what his work contained. He would also read the whole of a newspaper and hence it was that he could not read many in order to make his own journal contain a thorough record of the week. But for all that, so full of thoughts he was that a single newspaper would afford him ample straws with which to make yery handsome bricks. One little suggestion was enough to single newspaper would aftered him ample straws with which to make very handsome bricks. One little suggestion was enough to provoke in him the highest philosophy, most original thoughts, the brightest literature and the most wholesome and entertaining reading. The world has not as yet produced such a brilliant paragraphist as Dr. Sambhu Chunder, and even Englishmen of high education and culture admitted this truth.

nigh education and culture admitted this truth.

Dr. Sambliu Chunder was a severe and yet a large-hearted critic.

If he hit anybody he always hit with effect. The mean attacks in Anglo-Indian journals upon Native men and manners would provoke in him a sledge-hammar retalistion. But he could never be provoke in him a sledge-hammar retaliation. But he could never be mean. His darts hit those at whom he levelled them with tremend-ous effect, because he hit from a high platform which reminded them of their low level. He had a profound pity and therefore no mercy for all sorts of meanness and his independence now and again led him into condemning personal iniquities which often incited bad feelings against him. But Sambhu Chunder was ever conscientious and never vindictive. He, of course, erred many a time in policy and principles, but he always erred on the side of conscience. conscience.

But Sambhu Chunder was more a man of heart than intellect. of his highly developed intellectual powers were but the result of his highly developed heart. The old saying that where the heart is all right, the head seldom fails embodies a truth which is as goed a shoemaker's son would one day sit in judgment over the highest as the fact that man is born to die. Sambhu Chunder's worst patrician in the country. Nor had he much sincere regard for enemies would make him forget the worst injuries show had a second by merely going to him and asking to be excused. A struggling editor or a young journalistic venture would receive from him the warmest encouragement though never sought for. None could more truly appreciate merit or be more enthusiastic in acknowledging originality. He could enter into the spirit of any body's writings almost as thoroughly as the writer himself, and in correcting or "doing up" manuscripts of his contributors or correspondents he always strove to preserve the idea and spirit of the writers, nay, his charming pen would touch up that idea or spirit into strikingly full bloom and expression.

Sambhu Chunder's virtues, greatness and attainments were so vast and varied that it would fill a big volume to relate all of them. It is, indeed, impossible even to mention a little with appreciation within the scope of a newspaper article however long. We would, therefore, conclude here with the promise that we shall gry to record these varied features of his character in these columns as an opportunity offers. In fine, we must once more say that Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee was really a man in a million. He was an indomitable genius, and what genius has ever been truly appreciated in his day? The world loves talent because it serves it. may one exclaim of Sambhu Chunder:

His life was gentle : and the elements So mixed in him that Nature might stand up And say to all the world--- This was a man.

AT A PENNY APIECE.—£20,000.

If you had as many pennies as there are natural holes through your skin, how many pennies should you have?

You would have enough to make £20,000. Now figure up the holes for yourself. Yet you couldn't afford to sell them for a penny each, even in bard times. They are worth more money. These holes, or sweat glands, pour out quarts of swent every day—water, mixed with salt and paisonous humairs. Stop these holes, partly or entirely, and the skin's work is at once thrown on the langs and kidneys. Then you fall ill with some disease or other. With what disease depends on the nature and location of your weak spot.

A lady, whose, name we are permitted to mention, will not soon forget the spring of 1890. It was then that fur the first time in her life she was afraid to be left alone; not from fear of enemies, but from sheer nervous excitement. She was obliged to have elastic put into make repress to let them out—her feet were swollen so; and her hands were in the same condition. In the morning her face would puff up and large lumps form under her eyes and on her cheeks. Then a rash made its appearance all over her body, vanishing again almost immediately, as a blinsh comes and goes on the face.

The suddencess of this she compares to the sting of a wasp or borner. An intense tiching accompanied it, so she could not lie in bed or be quiet in any position on account of it. She was in unsery night and day, and scarcely knew what to do with herself. Her legs got so painful and felt so tired she was but to it to get about. For eighteen mouths (it must have seemed like as many years) she was tormented in this way.

At that time, the lady says, she first felt languid, tred, and constantly sleepy. She was troubled with bad headaches and attacks of giddiness. Her appetite failed; she could eat har little, and after eating had a feeling of weight and thieses at the cuest and sizes. Her whole system was depressed, and the life in her appeared to sink, as the water does in a cistern where there exists a hidden leak sunnewhere. Then came what has already head described. been described.

At Narth Sunderland, whither she went for a change of air, she met As tractic similariting, without size went for a change of air, she met a gentleman named Cathcart, who expressed a most intelligent opinion of her case and advised the use of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. Convinced by his reasoning she procured a supply of this well-known remedy and began taking it.

Convinced by his reasoning she procured a supply of this well-known remedy and began taking it.

Her letter concludes in these words: "After I had used the Syrup only a few days I felt a decided improvement in all respects. My appetite revived, my fond digested better, and soon the rash and lumps entirely disappeared to return no more. I have since enjoyed the best of health. You are at liberty to make my statement public if you think it may be useful to others. (Signed) Mrs. Sarah Charleton, 27, John Street, Arthur's Hill, Newcastle, February 7th, 1893."

We congratulate this lady on her recovery and thank her for allowing us to publish the above details of her experience. The doctors called her ailment nettle rash, but it was more than that. Her blood was loaded with the poisonous acids generated by indigestion and dyspepsia—the same as the poisons of gout and of acute inflammatory rheumatism. The irritated nerves of the skin produced the rash, as the clogged pores were unable to excrete the poison. The purifying power of Seigel's Syrup expelled this poison through the kidneys and bowels, and by stimulating insensible perspiration over the whole surface of the skin. surface of the skin.

Of this disease an English physician says: "When it beco-ironic all treatment fails."
Yes, all treatment except the one which cured Mrs. Charleton.

OPINION ON THE BOOK.

It is a most interesting record of the life of a remarkable man. -Mr. H. Babington Smith, Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October,

Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October, 1895

Di Mookeijee was a famons letter-writer, and there is a breezy freshness and originality about his correspondence which make it very interesting reading—Sir Alfred W. Corfi, K C I E., Duector of Public Institution, Bengal. 26th September, 1895.

It is not that aim of the pressure of hargssing official duties an English Civilian can find either time or apportunity to pay 50 graceful a tribute to the memory of a native personality as F. H. Skrine has done in his biography of the late Dr. Simbliu Chunder Mookeijee, the well-kniuw Bengal juminalist (Calcutta, Thacker, Spink and Co.); nor are there many who are more worthy of being this honoured thin the late E-litar of Rev. and Rayyet.

For much of the briggaphical matter that issues so freely from the press an apology is needed. Had no broggaphy of Dr. Mokeljee, the E-litor of Reis and Rayyes, appeared, an offus remarkable person dity, who was easily first among native Indian journalists, and many respects occupied a higher plane than they did, and looked at puboc affirs from a different point of view from theirs, could not be suffered to sink into oblivious without some attempt to perpetuate his memory by the usual expedient of a "life." The difficulties common to all biographers have in this case been increased by special circumstances, not the least creased by special circonstances, not the lenst of which is that the author belongs to a different race from the subject. It is true that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the learned Doctor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreigners understand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assimilation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mookerjee remained to the last a Biahman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that was nothing but respect and appraval. In consequence of this, his ideal brographies would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathies, and trained like him in Western learning. If Bengul had produced such another man as Dr. Mookenjee, it was he who should have written his life.

his life.

The biography is warmly appreciative without being needlessly laudatory; it gives on the whole a complete picture of the man; and in the book there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters addressed to Dr. Mookeijee are of such minor importance that they might have been omitted with advantage, but not a word of his own letters could have been spired. To say that he writers idiomatic English is to say what is short of the truth. His diction is easy and correct, clear and straightforward, without Oriental luxuriance or striving after effect. Perhaps he is never so charming as when he is laying down the laws of literary form to young aspirants to fame. The letter form to young aspirants to fame. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticism c'it is delicate plain-speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a he accomplishes the difficult test of telling a would-be poet that his productions are not in the smallert degree poetry, without one may conclude, either offending the youth or repressing his ardaur.

—The Pioneer, (Allahabad) Oct. 5, 1895.
The career of "An Indian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting.

Mankeylee's letters are marvels of pure diction which is heightened by his nervous style.

The life has heen told by Mr. Skrine in a very pleasant manner and which should make it popular not only with Bengalis but with all those who are able to appreciate merit unmarred by who are able to appreciate merit unmarred by ostentation and earnestness unspoiled by harshness,—The Muhammadan, (Madras) Oct.

5, 1895.
The work leaves nothing to be desired either in the way of completeness, impartiality, or lifelike portrayal of character.

Mr. Skrine deals with his interesting subject with the unfailing instinct of the bingrapher, Every side of Dr. Mackeijee's complex character is treated with sympathy tempered character is treated with sympathy tempered by discrimination."

Mr. Skrine's narrative certainly impresses one with the individuality of a remarkable man.

Mookerjee's own letters show that he had not only acquired a command of clear and flexible English but that he had also assimilated that sturdy independence of thought and character which is supposed to be a peculiar possession of natives" of Great Britain. His reading and the stores of his general information appear to have been, considering his opportunities, little less than marvellons.

his opportunities, little less than marvellons. One of the first to express his condolence with the family of the decoased writer was the present Viceroy, Lord Elsin. Mookerjee appears to lave won the affection not only the dignitaries with whom he came in contact, but also of those in low estate.

The impression left upon the mind upon laying down the book is that of a good and whose career has been grantically and the mind whose career has been grantically.

The career of an eminent Bengali editor, portions light upon the career of an eminent beingen exitor, who died in 1894, throws a curious light upon the race elements and bereditary influences which affect the criticisms of Indian journal-

The "Life and Letters of Dr. S. C. Monkerjee," a hook just edited by a distinguished civilian in Calcutta, takes us behind the scenes of Indian journalisms

It is a parrative, written with insight and a complete mastery of the facts, of how a clever youth gradually grew into one of the ablest leader-writers in Bengal, and still more gradu-ally matured into one of the fairest-minded editors that western education in India has yet produced. If the training and experience which develop the journalist in England are sometimes varied, they seem in India to have an even wider range.

But the object of this notice is to show how a great Bengal journalist is made; space fur-bids us to enter upon his actual performances. They will be found set forth at sufficient length, and with much felicity of expression, in Mr. Skrue's admirable monograph. It is characteristic of the noble service to which onaracteristic of the noble service to which Mr. Skinne belongs, that such a book should have issued from its ranks. Dr. Mookerjee was no optimist. One of his brilliant speeches contained the following sentence:—"I India has neither the soil nor the elasticity enjoyed has neither the soil nor the elasticity enjoyed by young and vigorous communities, but present the and rocks and deserts of an effere civilization, hardly stirred to a semblance of life by a foreign occupation dozing over its easily-gained advantages." This was true of the pre-Mutiny India of 1851. If it is no longer tue of the Queen's India of 1895, we owent in no small measure to Indian journalists like Dr. Mookerjee who have Libbuued, amid some misrepresentation, to quirken the some misrepresentation, to quicken the "semblance of life "into a living reality.—'The Times, (London) October 14, 1895.

And then, my brethren looked askance, Or passed me, with averted glance, The haggard look, that spoke my doom, Was even too dark, for convent gloom. Oh! I have ever found it sa, That those, the deenest plunged in giref, Will look, in vain, amid their wae, And most, to priesthood, for relief. And then, to please our prelate's pride, Must we run, by his litter's side ; That couch, besprent with gilding o'er. AVhile sackcloth was the rabe, he wate; The way his jewelled heralds led, While he wore ashes, on his head, Whose matted han, around it wound, Unloased, would sweep, along the ground.

X.

Such service, well, might suit a page, Or manking, from his convent cage; But arm, accustomed to the brand, Disdains to wield an usher's wand. Like fettered eagle, in his rage, I fretted, in my narrow cage ; They saw my state, and judged my pain, That I was, as the desert's child, And bade me seek Sugoojah's wild, * And tend their rich domain ; Aye I tend their wealth, who never knew, To watch, or keep my own ; I promised nut ; but bade adieu, And wandered forth, once more alone.

XI.

I tore, and cast my clothes, aside, And smeared my body, and my hair, With ashes, and the tiger's hide Slung, at my back, as now I wear, The sole, scant vesture, that remained, For all those gauds, my rapine gained. My matted hair, in plaited fold, The staff, and scrip, the arms, I bore, For the keen blade, which once I wore ;

But these, for long, had ceased to be, And, with my passions to contend, I roamed a houseless Sunyassee! No change had I, to hope, or dread, Save that, should lay me, with the dead ; And I would, then, have felt a pride, To've known the worst, that could betide, Had my own fate, whate'er it were, Been object of a moment's care.

Small matter, where my footsteps bore ; And so, I thought, 'twould soothe, once more, To gaze, upon the stone-built dome, Holds Jeswunt Halkar's tomb. I found the spot, I sought, and there, Still faithful, even beyond the grave, And ready, tho' he could not save, His favourite steed was grazing near, Fast by his master's bier 1 I saw, and grieved ;-nor sought to chide My weakness, when the starting tear Gushed forth, I could not hide. And there, the priest his vigil keeps, And there, the lamp, for ever, burns, And there, the war-worn veteran weeps, t And there, the weary traveller turns, And pauses, on his trackless way, For the final rest of him, to may, Whose checkered lot forbade to know. What quiet meant, while here below. And, surely, they have mourned him well, 'Tis thus, he would have loved to dwell,

"pride; the love of things of this world; and Mutsara, revenge" + Many years ago, the sepoys of one of the battalions of the old Fourth Regiment of Bengal Native Infantry, in passing the tomb, I think in Bondelkund, of the officer, by whom the corps was raised, worshipped or paid their devotions, at his grave; I am not sure, whether I was not told, that a fakeer attended at the tomb, or kept a lamp burning there. The battalions of the Regiment in question still retain their respective designations of Burra, and Chotah Clawford, (i.e.) the great and halle Crawfords; they are both very distinguished corps.

They make but one mucal, and live on alms; and instead of a copper cup, which others "generally carry about with them, they are permitted to use earthen—ware only. Their clothes are dyed with red earth, and they carry "a long bomboo cane, in their hands. They are forbid to touch, "either gold at silver, much less are they allowed to carry any, about "them. They have no fixed habitation, nor lie two nights together in the same place, once a year excepted, when they are permitted to continue together two months, in the same place, "The Sunyassees are bound to be always ready to oppose six "enemies, viz., Cama, lust; Croota, auger; Lopa, avairce; Madda, "pride; the love of things of this world; and Mutsara, revenge"; Madda, "pride; the love of things of this world; and Mutsara, revenge";

I went my way, and passed our haunt, By the Nurbuddah's stream; Like spirits, at the word, avaunt ! Or shadows, in a guilty dream, Gone were they, every one ! The very walls were gone ! And onward, still, my footsteps led, To Teoor's city of the dead ; *

It is remarkable, for the runs alluded to in the text; they are supposed to be those of the ancient Gurath, the capital of Goaidwanah. "There is now scarcely one stone standing inpon another, while the daok, dark, jungle, which grows upon its site, is all but inopenetrable. "This is indeed desolution! The crumbling dost of bricks and thes, for "miles around, mark, however, how extensive it once was, and perhaps when there shall be fewer remains, than there now are, may satisfy the imquirer, that it, like Babylon, indeed existed. Yes! I stood upon the site of a queen's palace, which is now a shapeless mound or carn of longe stones, and saw the poor artist dig out large blocks of stone, which had constituted a portion of some colossal idol, to mould them to the more shapeless forms of modern days. The temples above alluded to belong to the Buddhist or Jain worship, and contain many images of great beauty, cut in a very fine sandstone. The palace is said to have been that of Diugontee, a queen of the Gonads. The following account of this heriog, but ill-fated princess, extracted from Dow's translation of Ferishtah's History of India, is so interesting, that I consider no apollogy agrees by for giving it insertion. In Dow's Instory, the name is written Durgetti, but I have used that adopted in the text, as being more in accordance, with the promunication of the people of the country. "At that time, the kingdom of Guriah was governed by a "queen, whose name was Durgetti, famous for her beauty, and accomplishments: her dominions were about three hundred miles in length, and one hundred in breadth, yet so flourishing was the country.

"Asaph, having heard of the riches of this country, disturbed the "peaceable inhabitants, unaccustomed to the sound of war, with constant depredations; he at length marched against them, with six thousand horse, and about double that number of infantry. The queen, with fifteen hundred elephants, eight thousand horse, and some foot, prepared to oppose him. Like a bold herium, she led on her troops to action, clothed in armour, with a helinet upon her head, mounted in a castle, upon an elephant, with her bow, and quiver, lying by her side, and a binitched lance in her hand. Though her troops bad not been accustomed to action, the love of national independence and the example of the queen, inspired every breast with a hon's courage. Their eageness to engage made them match in disarder, towards the enemy, which the queen observing, commonded them to halt, and for ang her line anew, gave her triops strict orders to march on slowly, and compactly, and to observe the signal to engage, when it hould be displayed from the elephant, that carried the royal standard.

"The principal objects of attraction were the remains of two piloces of considerable antiquity. The larger one had been magnificent, and could scarcely yet be said to be in ruins. Viewed in connection with the capital of the country, it appeared to have been the Windsor Casile of the Goand monarchs. THE auginal estimate of the income-tix for the Lower Provinces for 1894 95 was Rs. 42.30,000. It was rused before the operations commenced to Rs. 43,75,000. The amount realized was 45,61 118. The net revenue gives an increase of 5't per cent, against an increase of of 3 per cent, in the preceding year. The number of persons finally assessed came up to 106,975 or an increase of 1,499, or 1'4 per cent. Out of 108 765 persons originally assessed, 1,790 were exempted on revision, the percentage of exemption being 1'6 against 2'1 in the preceding year. The average incidence of the tax was Re. 1 to 17'9 persons. In Calcutta one person in 39 paid the tax, the average incidence Re. 1 to every 4 persons remaining the same as in the preceding year. THE papers publish some important information regarding the settlement of the long pending Pamir Question, and the cordial relations existing between Great Britain and Russia in those parts. In an interview with a representative of Reuter's Agency, Colonel Gerard, the Bittish Commissioner, said :-

THE START.

"We started from Simila on June 15 last, and met the Russian Commission on July 22 at Like Victoria. We completed the demarcation of the frontier by the first week of September, and on the 13th of that month one whole work was concluded. I left the Paulirs that day, and matched with the Russian Commission, as their guest, as far as the frontier at Ash. Thence I came by port horses via Khokaud and Tashkend to Samarkand, whence I proceeded on my journey by the Trans-Caspian Railway."

RUSSIAN HOSPITALITY.

"First of all I want to draw attention to the extreme cordiality which existed between the Russian and British Commissions. At a moment like the present, when there is much discussion on Anglo-Russian relations, it is well to dwell upon the fact that, so far as the Panir Questian is concerned, the two Gavernments are absolutely at one. The Russians could not have extended greater cordiality towards me than they did, and had I been a Frenchman, the reception given me would hive been receptivate telegraphed as evidence of the solidity of the France-Russian alliance. The British and Russian camps were pitched close to one another, the Union Jack and the Russian ensign flusted side by side, and the British and Russian afficers duly exchanged hospitalities. At the town of Ash we received a great ovation, and on our nearing Marghlian the whole garison turned out to honour as. We were entertained at a supper and there were freworks and illuminations, the British and Russian fligs being displayed on all sides. At all the public banquets—about six in number—arranged in on honour at the different towns through which we passed, the Queen's health was invariably drank first, and the specifies dwelt upon the conduct relations existing between the two Powers. Or the rathery a special saloon was placed at my disposal by the Russian ambouttes. I was invited to the Governors' houses, and stayed there instead of putting up a bridels. In fact, everybody went out of his way to pay is a stention, the hospitality heing almost over-powering. The relations hetween the representatives of strained relations are unitue."

THE SETTLEMENT.

THE SETTLEMENT.

"Both Commissions have agreed to a line of demarcation up to the Chinese frontier. All the documents have been signed, and me now on their way home. The Panin Question is practically settled. When the Commissions reached the highest point attainable, the last pillar (No. 12) of demarcation was driven in, and the Russian Com-missiones, tuning to me, said:—"There lies the Panir Question, buried hensith that sione." The value of the Pouris themselves is "I. The value of the Augustian is that we known in whose territory inissiones, tuning to me, said:—'There lies the Pamir Question, builded beneath that stone.' The vame of the Points themselves aid. The value of the Agreement is that we know on whose territing we stand and thus dispines similar to those which occurred in Shignan, Roshan, and elsewhere will be prevented. By one Agreement, there is a huffer State, party Chitese and party Afghan, between the Russian fronter and the Hindu Kush. In the Pamirs themselves, everything is in a complete state of rest. The Russians have one garrison at the Pamirski Past, and the nearest support of that force is at Kullin, where is a sotura of Cossacks. The last-named post is two hundred onles north of the Pamirski Post, which is about a hundled nules north of the frontier agreed upon as the limit of the respective apheres of influence. There were no Afghans on the Pamirs; they had all withdrawn to the left bank of the river. The nearest Afghan post we passed was one composed of seven men at Sashad-i-Wakhan. The Chinese Garrison at Tash-Kurgan consisted of three hundred Regulars, who were in full occupation of the district. The nearest Burish post is in the Hunza Nagy connery, one hundred and forty miles from the present limit of the spliete of influence on the road to Gight. At the end of July the two Commissions bestowed new names on the monitans and lakes forming the new boundary. The Sarl Kul we named Lake Victoria, and the range of mountains we called after the Emperor Nicholas. The two chief peaks were called Mount Salisbury and Mount Lobanoff, and the highest connecting peak between Lake Victoria and the watershed of the Nicholas range of meutains we called after the Emperor Nicholas.

THE TRANS-CASPIAN RAILWAY.

"The extension of the Trans-Caspian Railway is proceeding apace. It is a purely commercial undertaking. The alarmist reports in the Indian papers about the ulterior motives of Russia with respect to the strategic value of the line are absird. The Railway goes merely through the commercial centres, and travels perallel with the frontier. So far from mining towards the frontier, it rather edges away from it. To suppose that the country through which this line passes is desolate, and that the railway must, therefore, be intended for strategic uses, is ridiculous. The country is one of amazing fertility, and resembles Cashmere. Populous villages abound, and the land is densely cultivated. There is a very large industry in cotton and silk As evidence of the richness of the country, I would point out that the State Bank of Krokand, only recently stated, does business to the extent of a million sterling monthly. All the roads are crammed with caravass of conton, of which Turkestan could produce a quarter of all that commonly required for Russia. All this I mention only to show that there is real need for the railway, and to refine the notion that it is mented for wailke purposes. As I said before, it is purely commercial."

COMMERCE NOT WAR.

"Russia's policy is one of commerce rather than of war. The great thing to remember is that Russia and Great Britain are now absolutely at one on this question, which, at one time, seriously threatened the friendly relations between the Gavernments of London and St. Petersburg."

MESSRS. Thacker, Spink and Co, are advertising a new edition of Letters written in a Mahratta Camp during the year 1849, by Thumas Duer Broughton. The letters were first published in England, in 1813, by Murray, Albemarle Street. They were noticed by Sydney Smith in the Edinourgh Review in a short critique which shows all the peculiarities of Sydney's genus and style. The following extract will, we are sure, be read with interest.

"This is a lively, entertaining, well-written book; and we can conscientiously recommend it to our readers. Mr. Thomas Duer Broughton does not, it is true, carry any great weight of metal, but, placed in a amious and novel scene, he has described what he saw from day to day, and preserved for the manusement of his readers, the impressions whigh those scenes made upon him, while they were yet strong and fresh. The journals of military men are given to the public much more frequently than they used to be; and we considerably class of publications as one of great utility and importance. The duties of such men lead them into countries very little known to Europeans, and give to their the usens of observing and describing very striking peculiarities in manners, habits, and governments. To lay these before the public is a praiseworthy undertaking and if done simply and modestly (as is the case with this publication), deserves gieat encouragement. Persons unaccustomed to writing, are prevented from attempting this by the fear of not writing sufficiently well; but where there is something new and entertaining to tell, the style becomes of comparatively little importance. He who lives in a Mahratta camp, and tells us what he hears and sees, can scarcely tell it minss. As far as mere style is concerned, it matters very little whether he writes like Cavar or Nullas. Though we praise Mr. Broughton for his book, and praise him very sincerely, we must warm him against that die afful propeusity which young men have for writing verses. There is multing of which Nature has been more bountiful than poets. They swarm like the spawn of cond-fish, with a victous fecundity that mytes and requires destinction. To publish verses is become a sort of evidence that a nin wants sense; which is repelled not by wiring good verses, but by wiring excellent verses;—by displaying talents great enough to overcome the disgnist which proceeds from satiety, and showing that its never too late to repent and do well. We hope Mr. Broughton will enier

THE situation in Tuckey continues critical. THE Reichstag was opened on December 3. The Emperor William in his speech from the throne said that the futerial relations of Germany continue to be freendly. The effort of Germany, Russia, and France to avert further complications arising from the war between China and Japan had been successful, thanks to the judicious moderation shown by Japan. The result, His Majesty said, would contribute to preserve and enlarge a field of peaceful labour for Germany's industry and trade. The situation arising from the deplorable events in Turkey had occupied the serious attention of Germany, who faithful to her alliance and the principles of German policy, was ever ready to co-operate with the Powers whose interests require them to work in the cause of peace. The united resolution of the Powers was to respect treaties and support the Sultan's Government in establishing order. The state of things justifies the hope that their efforts will not want success.

The President then goes on to say that the country is financially ill, and will require heroic treatment. He deprecates free coinage under the guise of bimetalism. In conclusion he urges the necessity of maintaining neutrality in the Cuba question.

THE last St. Andrew's Dinner was one of the largest-intended. The Hon'ble P. Playfair occupied the chair. The usual to ists of recent years were drunk and there was merciment all round. We publish elsewhere the speech of the Chateman, We have no space this week for that of the Lieutenant-Governor

THE ever active Su Charles Ethott is more than attentive to his work now that he is about to lay down the tems of office. He is anxions that the orders made by him he issue it as soon as massed. He means evidently in leave a clean table for Sir Alexander Mockenzie.

BESIDES official work, Sir Chinles's closing days in Calcutta are fully occupied with duties thrown on him by his friends and admirers, Since his return to Cilcutta with Ludy Elliott, he is much pressed for time for all the last honours to him. List Siturday he was the chief guest at the St Andrew's Dinner. This week is pietty full. On the 4th the Mahomedans opened the complimentary farewell for which they have been preparing themselves. It was the naming of the Medressalt Hostel under construction. The principal speakers were Prince Jehan Kodr. Bidadoor, Khan Bidadoor Abdul Jubb u and Mr. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman. They fully in tified the inovement started by the Mahomedans for a public entertainment and memorial to their great patron. The Houble Prince in a few grateful words obtained permission of the Lienten oit-Govern it to n one after from the Histel "to keep alive in generations to come the memory of what His Honor, has done for the welfare and advince of the Mahomedan community." Mr Ribman was equally enthusiastic. He said ;-

Rahman was equally enthusiastic. He said:—

"Sin Charles Ethort will be long and gratefully remembered by the present and future generations of Mahomedius in Bengal in connection with this noble edifice wind is now a course of construction—His Hanna's regarded in munificace. The backwindness of Mahomedius in education has been a source of constant anxiety and thought to the leaders of the Mahomediu community for more those a quarter of a century. The raises are many and well known, but, gentlemen, I am delighted to say that one of them has been may removed. Mahomedius prents in Bengal were unable to send their children for the pumpess of education to Calcuta mining in these being no suitable accommodation for them or proper or adequate supervision over them by any recognised authority. That great want which has been felt for years together has now been supplied. That being significant is community feels will ring from one end of Bengal to the other. Dr. Hærile has male a reference to my humble efforts towards the prometon of this hoster. All I can say is that as long as I am alive my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the mest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be always devoted to the truest and best uncress of my services will be adversed to the truest and best uncress of my services will be adversed to the truest and best uncress of my ser

The speech of the day was the address of Khan Bahadoor Abdul Jubbar. He entered into the causes-the social changes which made the Hustel a necessity. He also explained that in giving his substantial support, Sir Chailes was not unjustly partial to the Mahomeilans, He remarked :

OThe Koran teaches its followers to be grateful to their benefactors and it is only an act of gratitude on the part of my co-religionists to express a wish that the hostel should bear His Honor's name. Upexpress a wish that the hostel should bear His Honor's name. Upwards of a century ago Mr. Warren Hastings established the Calcutta Medressa for the benefit of the Mahomedans, and his name has ever since been a household word among the Mahomedans of Bengal. I have no doubt that the uame of Sir Charles Elliott will be equally remembered by present and future generations, His Hunor having given to the students of the Medressa a residence. In the good old time the need of a hustel was not much felt, as then every well-to-do Mahomedan in Calcutta was attentive to the pious duty of sheltering and feeding one or more students. Unfortunately,

We would draw the attention of our readers to the letter of Professian Vambéry in the correspondence column. We cannot be sufficiently grateful to now for his reserved messages of good will from the brooks of the Dambe. We wish our countymen will profit by his teachings and seam has cannot by to suck all base distinct times between Huntus and Mathematica for the beach of Iodians in general.

The Todays difficulty has been solved for the moment. The Holkar wise statesm in he adopted, without injustice to the clauss of such measures as would inductly amenorate their condition

In his reply to the vote of thanks proposed, by the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Ameer Hossem, Sir Charles E lintt remembered the services done to the cause of Moho ned or education, and to that community by the late Newab Abdool Lateef Bih clour, and wished that a tablet might be erected to the new building to commemorate the memory of the deported Newab.

The day after, the Calcutt's Medical School entertained the retiring Lientenant-Governor to a farewell address.

Preparations have been made by Raja Benoy Krishna for this evening for an Evening Party to mret the Lieutenent-Governor. It is expected that not only the heads of Native society but the Pandits will assemble to bless the returns? Givernor and wish him a safe voyage home. We are not aware whether any other surprise is in store.

Next week comes off the grand native entertainment at the Town Hall to be followed by the Civil Service Dinner. Sir Chailes Ellintt will also open the Marcus Sanne and receive an address from the Society for the Higher Training of Young Men.

THE OLD BENGAL POLICE.

THE Bengal Police, when first organised in 1862, consisted of a heterogeneous mass of drafts from the old and the military Police and a proportion of new men to make up the full complement. The officers were of three different elements: 1st., Thana Darogahs, taken, with some few exceptions, from the old service, 2nd, commissioned and non-commissioned officers of the disbanded military Police battalions, and 3rd, a fair proportion of new men. The rank and tile consisted of a limited number of Thana burkundazes, the majority having declined to enter the new service from a vague fear, and a large proportion of Sepoys of the military battalions and recruits. The organisation had for its heads District and Assistant Superintendents. Some of these were S. C. officers, others belonged to the broken up Salt department. Not a few of the latter were young Englishmen ignorant of all work but who had sufficient interest to be provided for. It cannot, therefore, be supposed that any judgment was exercised in the selection of subordinate officers and men. The few educated and well-connected natives, who first entered the new Police as Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors, had to leave in a short time in disgust at the capricious treatment they received from their inexperienced superiors. As a consequence, native gentlemen having any self-respect refused to enter the department notwithstanding the fair prospect it offered of pay. Out of a large number of officers of this class, the proportion of educated men of good families, therefore, was small. The men recruited as constables were, in many instances, the refuse of the jails. Scarcely any enquiries were made regarding their character and antecedents. All that was wanted was a good array of uniformed men against the next inspection of the Deputy Inspector-General or other superior officer. Much success could not be expected of a department whose component parts were so weak.

After a little drill at the head-quarters of a District, | both subordinate officers and men were sent on duty to the different Police stations in the interior. During their stay at head-quarters, the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors were generally employed in the office of the District Superintendent as English clerks and in light office duty, because the regular ministerial establishment was ridiculously small. There was a school at the head-quarters of every District, but the subordinate officers never attended it; nor were they otherwise trained for the regular work they were subsequently called upon to perform. result was that most of them had to depend on Taidnierses, men without any pay but who, however, managed to make bandsome incomes. Some reform has since been attempted in this direction by appointing constables who can read and write. But Taidnuvises are still allowed at the recommendation of the Inspectors.

Considering the large area of every Bengal District, the number of officers and men at first sanctioned was insufficient. Since then several reductions have been made on account of financial embarrassments. Not to apeak of efficiency, the strength of the Force is inadequate for the two of its principal duties -- the prevention and detection of crime. There are also many stations, of which, instead of Sub-Inspectors, Head-constables are in charge. Their status and respectability may be judged by the fact that they are of four grades drawing salaries of Rs. 10, Rs. 15, Rs. 20 and Rs. 25. What a high officer to place over an area equal to that of an average English county, having, besides, immense power for good or evil over thousands of Her Majesty's subjects! Latterly, Sub-Inspectors have come to be placed over Thanas, which have, however, been reduced in number; but these officers are mostly no more than higher grade Head-constables. The average number of constables doing duty in each Police station is about fifteen, insufficient to go the round of a village even once a week, the jurisdiction of a Thana being very extensive. The village Chowkidars are, therefore, left pictty much the arbiters of the lives and property of the rayyet.

A few words are necessary regarding the village Chowkidari, or, as it is now called, the Rural Police. During the last twenty years Commissions have sat and to une of paper been written as to the means of re organizing the Raral Police, for its better control, ter rusing its status, and for making it a subordinate agency of the regular Police. How far the attempt has succeeded, we will not stop here to enquire. We will refer to some facts which may help the corputy. In some Districts the village Chowkidar, are still paid by Chakran or service lands granted by the Zemindurs, and in others by a small rate on i.ch householder. One who pays the piper may command the time. The Chowledges are as much the servants of Government as of the Zemindar or his agent, and the heads of the village community, ac ording to the system of payment in vogus. As in most cases their regular pay is a trille, they generally labor hard during the day to procure means to maintain themselves, and day to procure means to manage and to keep watch go to sleep when they are expected to keep watch and wild. Besides other multifarrous duties, they have to attend weekly or twice a week at the Police Station according to the distance of their villages and report a crime when it is the will of the Zemindar's agent or the heads of the village management of the procure of the procu there is no clashing of interests in a village and the people are of one mind, even heinous offences are suppressed and no information is allowed to reach the Police station. This is frequently done to obviate the infliction of the Police officers' visit and its consequent annoyance and expenses. The people have not forgotten that their sires and grandsires had to pay the Police-Salam for inducing the Police to close its investigation and leave the village. Even now Police officers and constables expect to live at the expense of the village as a customary right during their stay. If the crime is serious, the officer remains on the spot for several days during which all field work is at a standstill, the local bazar and shops are closed, the women are unable to get out of their homes for fetching water or for other domestic purposes, and festivities are stopped. If the offenders are detected and the investigation is conducted successfully, several of the substantial villagers have to proceed first to the Thanna, then to the head-quarters of the District to attend at the Magistrate's Court and possibly a second time at the Sessions Court.

The present Police, though reformed, unfortunately inherits a portion of the bad name which the old Police gained by its misdeeds. The old days are, however, gone by when, to obtain an appointment as Darogah or Mohurer or Jamadar, a man had to dance attendance at the Magistrate's Court for years and to fee the Sheristadar and Amlah, and when appointed to make presents at stated intervals. Cases are known in which more than a thousand rupees had to be paid. For a burkundazship a hundred and sometimes more was given. Then, again, all the Thannah establishment had to spend freely once a year when the Magistrate was on tour. The Amlah and Chaprasis who accompanied him and his personal servants had to be fed and paid handsomely. Though the Khansama was paid by the Magistrate for his Russad, not a pice ever reached the Darogah, and the Darogah was not the man to pay the actual supplies from his own pocket. Regarding appointments in the Police, the common saying was "whatever the character of the appointment, it carried with it butter and rice," meaning a grand style of living.

NEO-BUDDHISM.

An Oriental scholar of solid reputation, referring to the latest fad of Sir Edwin Arnold and Colonel Olcott, speaks of the movement for depriving the present possessors of the ancient Temple at Buddh-Gva, as "that great humbing of neo-Bullbiam and the mountebank propaganda of the Mahabodhi Societe." As the cause of neo Buddhisia has suldenly become popular with philosophical dilettantes of a certain class, we publish ib line on extract, especially translated, from the last "Bulletin" in Pren h of M. A. Barth, dealing almost exhaustively with the que con. It deal with the history of the movement till the end of 1893 Very little requires to be added for bringing it down to die. The reflections of M. Barth are so obiviously just that, except a law ital of fanatics who pritend to have found in Billbusmiths most advanced type of faith, every one will yield his ready assent to them. The "Bulletin," we may mention, is a critical account, which M. Barth publishes every third or fourth year, of the works issued during the period, on In han religions. The Bengali mind is eminently imitative. It could not be that when mon like Sir Edwin Arnold and Col. Olcott entered the field there would be no Bengali imitators, however dubious the honour attaching to a successful trot across or around it. Accordingly, Babu Nobin Chandra Sen, "the poet of the Hindu ruival," although unfamiliar with the spelling of the very name of the great work that forms the basis of that inival, came forward with his Amaabba or a versified life of Buddha after the fashion of The Light of Ana. We have, in a recent number, expressed our opinion about the merits of Babu Son's work. Hear now how a foreign critic speaks of Sir Edwin's versified life of the same religious teacher. " The Light of Ana (and the same may be said of the translation of Gitagornila) may be a fine piece of versification, the judgment of which must be left to his countrymen; but it is a bad work, without any true poetry, for there can be no true portry where there is no common sense."

"With M. Augustin Chibourtan (10thor of an Essay on Buddhist philosophy) we leave the domain of tangible studies to enter upon the limboes of Bullhism, and its allies, occultism, theosophy, spiritism, Kabbalism, &c. M. Chabonicau who is the editor of the "Veil of I-1s," and an esotetist, unless I am mistaken, will not allow himself to be classed as a neo-Buddhi to and is ever ill disposed towards it, I cannot well see why. When once he has cleared himself of certain executricities, his method at bottom and his results are almost the same because he seeks for and finds in Bud thism not only a trius and ental philosophy, unique and original, but also a science, dectine I, it may be, to be the science of the 20th century, but in any case, a stience markedly in advance of our own age. His book deserves, for some reason, to be ranked above the ordinary productions pen forth by this school. but still it does belong to one and the same class. No one expects me to give a detailed account of that literature, and even if he did, I would be incapable of giving one. I cannot even be certain whether the periodicals of all sizes and shapewhich champion him and are his organs, are still airee-such as the Lucyler (London), the Pab (New York), the Lette Figure (of Dr. Franz Hartmann of Leipzic), without condoing the Ports papers. It some up in 40 articles the common creed of all Buddhiss (see the number of the journal for Jan, 1892). It can readily be supposed that this platform of common belief, as Colonel Olcott terms it, is feeble enough and bears little resemblance to the Buddhism of any epoch or of any known land,

All that it proves for the time being is that in India, as elsewhere, it has been centralized among persons without much discernment; possibly too it was taken quite seriously at the recent Chicago Congress. The Society professes, moreover, to have one celectic and naively mastic cult for all ancient, manifestations of Aryan thought, and the Transplant contains in this connection a certura amount of Hindoo religious archeology, from which we must not expert toom to hierarcism, but which is at the same time of a real value and superior at all events to anything published in similar periods, ils in the West. It was in the Light of Ana by Sir Edwin Arnold, possibly a great post, un loubtedly a fanatic and a dilettante, that this so called dergyram found his printrose path). In Ceylon, the movement has several organs, both Singhalese and English, notably the Badilhot of Colombo, founded in 1888, patronised and more or less inspired by Colonel Olcott; a paper which, as the title shows, represents mine especially militant Buddhism. Letters to the Editor.

"AN INDIAN JOURNALIST."

Budapest University, November 15, 1895.

DEAR SIR, -- I have just finished reading Mr. Skrine's interesting book on the life of Dr. Mookerjee, and I cannot refrain from giving you some of the impressions the biographical details of your late editor have left upon me. The effect of a book is always in connection with the bias and tendencies of the reader, and it is very natural that everybody tries to pick out from the store offered to him the information mostly needed for the completion of his studies. Being a many years' student of the life and languages of Eastern peoples I gather from the biographical skesch, and particularly from the correspondence of the late Dr. Mookerjee, experiences which are unique in their way. In spite of the special attention I have paid hitherto to the life and doings of Indian men of eminence, like the late Sir T. Madava Rao, Sir Salar Jung, Dr. Rajendralala Mitra and of others still living, I dare to affirm that the late Dr. Mookerjee stands out, in many points, from his famous countrymen, and as a journalist he ranks amongst the first of his colleagues in Europe. What strikes me particularly in his remarkable personality, is his extensive reading in various branches of science, his unprejudiced opinion on men and matters absolutely heterogenous from the peculiar views in which he was brought up, and above all his liberal mode of thinking in religious matters, although he kept faithfully to the Brahmanic dogma, remaining always a thorough Indian. Excepting his love of change and his want of steadily persevering in one career, there is nothing that denotes in him the Eastern character, nothing that reminds one of the shortcomings of many Turks, Arabs, Persians and Central-Asiatics, who took to an assiduous study of our Western life and sciences and still remained Asiatics at the bottom of their hears, I mean to say that they failed to penetrate the real spirit of modern civilisation and were always wavering between the two theories of light and culture. Dr. Mookerjee must, therefore, be looked upon as an exception to the rule and as an evident proof of the fact that the subtle mind of an Asiatic is easily turned into a thoroughly European one, and that, owing to the innate perspicacity of Asiatics in general, he can even surpass his teachers and serve as a bright example to those who believe in the possibility of a radical change of men in Asia.

The life of the late Dr. Mookerjee may serve, on the other hand, as an encouragement to England's civilising efforts in the East. Pardon my want of modesty in saying that it is a justification of the views I have been defending for decades---that the British spirit of enterprise, of justice and of liberty is best suited for the promulgation of our Western culture in Asia. Tell me, can France, Russia and Holland boast of having produced men like the late Dr. Mookerjee? I am fully aware of the many mistakes committed by the English in India. I cannot find sufficient blame and reproach for the cold and haughty behaviour of the average Englishmen towards the natives of India --- but the efficient result of British rule is nevertheless undeniable. England is achieving a master-piece of work in the heart of Asia, and if the process of civilisation can go on undisturbedly we shall live to see many Indians, both Mussalmans and Hindus, like the hero of Mr. Skrine's book. I beg to remain,

> Yours obediently. A. VAMBERY.

A MUNICIPAL GRIEVANCE.

B alasore, the 30th Nov. 1805.

Some ten years ago necessity being felt for a slaughter house within the Municipality of Balasore the then Municipal Board selected a site by the side of a road and in the vicinity of to override by mandate the opinion deliberately and unanimously a Hindu village and built a slaughter house there ignoring formed by the Governor-General and his Council.

the entreaties of the Hindu community. Not only did it give a shock to the Hindus but also the hide godowns attached to the slaughter house rendered the neighbourhood unhealthy and became a source of continual annoyance and a nuisance. When the people began to complain of the stink that came from the hide godowns no body heeded them on the ground that the municipality in removing the slaughter house and the hide godowns would be put to an unnecessary additional expense. But when Babu Raj Narayan Das, an influential Zamindar of the town, came forward with an offer of defraying all the expenses of the removal, recourse was had to the plea of want of a more eligible site.

How far the municipality was in carnest in the reply will appear from the fact that when subsequently Mr. Gregg, the Sanitary Commissioner, came to the town and Banu Radha Charan Das shewed him the slaughter house and a secluded place a few hundred cubits off, he quite approved of the place and suggested the removal of the slaughter house there. Still no oction was

But thanks to a change in the Municipal Board and to the liberality of Babu Raj Narayan Das and his nephew Babu Radha Charan Das, this great nuisance is about to be removed to a place where there is no chance of its wounding the feeling of any Hindu neighbour or causing annoyance to any villager or passer by. Babu Radha Charan Das has paid to the Municipality about Rs. 1,000 to acquire a piece of land and to build a new slaughter house. We hope our Government will take notice of this liberality and thank the donors on behalf of the Hindu inhabitants of the town .--- Yours, &c.,

PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

THE TOAST OF "THE VICEROY AND THE LAND WE LIVE IN."

The Chairman, the Hon'ble P. Playfair, who was received with loud applanse, said:---Gentlemen, in accordance with traditional custom observed at this Nutional Festival, I have now the honour to propose the toast of--- His Excellency the Viceroy, and the Land we live in." I suppose that comparatively few people in India, and fewer still in England, realise the unceasing toil of office work that devolves upon the Vicerov of India, imposing a physical and mental strain of such severity as might reasonably deter many a mental strain of such severity as might reasonal stateman from accepting the high office. Lord Elgin's experience has been no exception to this rule. It was no enviable situation for a new Viceroy to find his Minister for Finance in the words of Sir Robert Peel-" seated in an empty chest by the pool of bottom-less deficiency, fishing for a budget" (laughter), and to have to less denciency, usuing for a banger (taughter), and to have resort to the unpopular expedient of increasing taxation. But with that kind of determination on the part of the Government of India that "aye keeps a stout heart to a stey brae" the difficulties of the situation were grappled with.

In the short time His Excellency has held office two events have happened that must take a place in History. The one has meant the important annual saving of nearly fifty lakhs of rupees by a reduction of interest on the India debt, a measure reducing, as His Excellency has gracefully acknowledged, to the credit of the Minister for Finance, our fellow countrymen, the Hon. Sir James Westland (cheers).

The other important event has unfortunately caused a large

The Chitral campaign has elicited our admiration of the gallantry and endurance displayed in both British and Native Troops. As a measure of experience, or as a test of armament and transport it may have been useful, but still we must regret that it should have become necessary to proceed so far, at a time when the treasury could but ill afford to meet the cost, and that the result should be an additional annual burden on the finances of the State.

It is very evident that like the little boy with P with Pears' Soap the Government of India would not be happy till they got Chitral, and as the sequel to the picture shows that the little lad was setisfied with the prize sought for and did not ask for more, it is to be hoped that the Government of India has now completed the annexation of necessary frontier outposts (applause).

Associated with the decision to retain Chitral, there comes a degree of satisfaction to those who hold the theory that good Government for India means Government by men on the spot (hear, hear), that with their return to office Her Majesty's Ministers did not attempt

It has been a General complaint of past years that India and her the ben fit of her competitors in the Far East and to producers affairs have had but an indefinite place of interest in the mind of the British public. A welcome change seems to be taking place, if we are entitled to draw this conclusion from the frequency with which articles on Indian subjects appear in magazines and newspapers at Home from the pen of politicians, financiers, investors and manufac-The views expressed for the most part seem however to indicate the personal interest only which each writer has in the country. There is the prophet of insolvency who predicts a universal distruct in Government Securities if the expenditure on the Army and Civil Service is not reduced; the pessionst who looks to invasion and decay; while on the other hand the investor and manufacturer apprehend an important rivalry from increasing prosperity to India.

One of the most interesting questions associated with the "Land we live in," the growing importance of which is, as I have said, attracting attention from without, is the prospect that is being un folded to India of a revivel of industrial enterprise (hear, hear).

India has begun to realise that through the adoption of the powerloom she may reinstate in another form, those employments that have been lost to her for a time by the annexations of western science. We all know that the absence of industrial enterprise is not a natural thing to India (hear), and that it has long been recognised that she may recover her lost industries as a relief to the pressure on the land and with benefit to the landless classes. England, under her beneficent principles of free trade, has assisted India towards this prospect. In addition to a flow of capital and supplies of machinery and tools there has been a steady stream of British, and for the most part Scots artistus picked workmen coming to India to educate and supervise the Native operative to whom the credit of reviving India's industrial enterprise is in a great measure due. This free transfer of capital, in its fullest sense has superseded the "sole market policy" adopted some generations ago when the exportation of machinery and materials used for warfare and the emigration of an artisan to a foreign and possibly hostile country was a grave and punishable offence. I venture to say, gentlemen that the party at Home that now attempts to let its voice he heard by complaining of British Capital in India allied to unjust laws having an unfair advantage over British Capital at Home hampered by British law, betrays a degree of self interest too clearly discernible to be likely to induce the British nation to go back npon its free trade principles and differentiate between a colonial and an Indian policy of trade (loud cheers). You will all agree with me I think that none of its came to reside in this country for change of air, and that in our endeavours to carn a living we wish to be placed in no worse a position than our fellow countrymen occupy in the Colonies, and to be looked upon with no greater jealousy. In attempting thus to help ourselves we have the satisfaction of knowing that we are also benefiting a large number of Her Majesty's Indian subjects.

In an epigram a modern writer refers to the competition in industrial enterprise between the East and West as a conflict between "the white man with his vellow mital and the yellow man with his white metal"; but favoured with chap labour, cheap fuel and possessed of the taw material is it to be wondered that Incha should arouse herself to make use of these resources? And is it surprising that a frugal people, endowed with patience, and the faculty of imitation, finding a means of reviving an here-ditary trade should attempt to re establish the minufacture of the coarser description of cotton and jute fabrics in India? (applant)

I have referred to the opposition that has been advanced at Home, and I would add that it can only be regarded as a misfortune a conflict auses from commercial competition between the mother country and any of her colonies or dependencys, and specially so when India is concern 1 (appliase). It would be unnatural did we not feel sympaths for our own kith and kin when natural did we not receive meants for our own kin and kin when overtaken by such competition. Their permanent institution will amount to a calamity. And in addition to this the position in which Ladia stands to Great Britaia entitles the interests of Great Britain's commerce to a consileration that cannot be dispute l. This position was set forth with frankness by Mr. Samuel Laing speaking from his place in the Legislative Council as Minister for Finance 33 years ago, when he said "he could not deny that England having founded the Indian Empire and being ready to sustain it, and having given up all preferences of exacting tribute as Holland does from Java, or spain from Cuba, and all claims on a monopoly of the Indian market and carrying trade may with some reason ask India so to levy the necessary revenue as not to interfere with trade between the two countries." (Hear, hear).

India's trade has never had protection, nor in the late discussion on the Cotton Duties Bill was protection sought, but as it has been acknowledged that the wealth of India lik. all other countries is in proportion not only to its natural resources out to the degree of liberty it may possess in the use of these resources, she claimed that liberty and nothing less. (Cheers.) And gentlemen, I apprehend that were India's natural advantages unnecessary legislation, it would in all probability be more to on the Continent of Europe than to British trade. (Hear, hear) The Indian Consumer regards price more than quality on account he is content with cheap mannfactures. The Bombay Spinners have already found successful rivals in the Cotton Mills of China and Japan. Japan has asserted her position as a manu-facturer and with increased knowledge of the craft is relying upon quality to sell her wares and is abandoning that artifice of spurious imitation and piracy with which she began to trade. Having actured Formosa, "the granary of China," rich in coal, petroleum and sulphur, Japan in likely to assert heiself still further in the minutacture of textiles in the Rast.

But there is a great force lying alongside of Japan that has hardly as yet been set in mattan. Japan may prove to have been merely the pioneer and the late war the herald of a new era. It China with her industrious and thrifty millions (hear) overcomes her superwith ner industrious and thritty inflions (near) overcomes her super-stitions dread of opening mines and prosecutes the textile in-dustry on which she has already embarked, she must become a potent factor as a producer. And this may happen soon. If the treaty of peace with Japan secures to that nation and therefore to the subject of the treaty powers, under the most favoured nation clause, liberty to engage in manufactures in China without tax or license fees, it is Certain that Germans and Americans will also enter the field of industrial enterprise and British-Indian, as well as British Manufacturers and Merchants will have to face the strength of foreign competition, it may be in woolen, silk and jute, as well as in cotton fabries. (Hear, hear.) With this prospect, gentlemen, I think you will permit me to say that the industrial enter prise of India not only requires absolute freedom from unuccessary restraint and factious interference, (lond cheers) but is also deserving of all the fostering care that can be bestowed upon hear). In demanding liberty to control our factories, 10 do mean to advocate anything approaching the working day of 2112 hours work (laughter and applause) as in China, nor am I personally in favour of night work, which is I believe frequently had work, (cheers) as I hold by the adage of the good old nursery thinness early to bed, and early to tise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise? (Laughter and appliance) What I desire to affirm is, that England cannot hope to retain the Eastern markets exclusively for her manufactures and that if India is not allowed the fullest liberty to conduct hir industries in accordance 'with the the fullest liberty to conduct nor industries in accordance with the customs of her people, her industrial trade abroad and perhaps also at Home, will be annexed by her competitors in the Far East. This view of the case I consider should be pressed upon the attention of the Burish public. We have perhaps been negligent preciate the growing relationship that exists between commerce and politics and its governing influence.

Having said so much with regard to the prospect of an enlarged area of supply, I do not m in to forecast a downfall of British trade with the East. With her skilled labout, natural resources, scientific inventions to effect economy in the employment of labour, and by her formulal strength, and geographical position, England will continue to hold her industrial appropriety. (Lond cheers,)

The field in Indicas fortunately very wide and to remine be passibilities for the extensive of volument of British trade when, according to an estimate recently table by Lener-line mannfacturers the total quantity of clith an addy consumed in India does not exceed 8% varids p.r.h. adoft to population. And as to matted value of India's production and approximation of yarus and textiles does not represent Rs. 1 2 0 per been said, would appear to be in the c now nuclothed.

Grademen, you know the old pro-Sor feathers British public eager to subscribe filte Railway, (langhter) and discussing with construction of a line through Bumi Cancer when there are practically a country throughout in-landan Empire that are practically a cost role for the want of Railway communication. Beingal uself a exceptionally better of for Railways. (Hear hear) for Railways (Hear, hear.) It has for every 29,000 soils; a condition the ity is hazardons in a country whose pool loars almost wholly dependant upon agriculture. Bombay is bei in off than Bongal, for with gird of the population it has one indeed of Railway to 8,000 souls. Madras with fittle more than 32 of the population of Bengal has one mile of Railway to 13,000 and The Punjabwhish has a population of 37rd of that of Bengal has one mile to 11,000 souls. (A Churt, when there are in the interests of human oice: What about Assam?) I haven'e out the figures for Assim, sir.

I see many in this Hall who have not considered that the Star; Railway serving the eastern districts of Bengal has met the requirements of commerce.

And you are aware that for many years the merchants of Calcula have asked for an additional line of ommunication to Northern India with its own separate entrar e to the Port and that this is between Calcutta and the North-West of 43,000 square miles containing 5% million people or an area half as large again as Scotland with a population Krd greater, the Commissioner of which has as a means of locomotion when inspecting the Districts, and it may be in reaching a parade ground, or in approaching a durbar what he describes as " a sort of attenuated bathing machine (laughter) dragged by coolies at the rate of 3 miles an hour."

(Renewed laughter.) One line of railway to Upper India is considered sufficient for the communications of a population of 100 millions with a port whose annual sea-borne trade is valued at Rs. 85 crores, employing four millions tons of shipping. Imagine Russia with one trunk railway. Can you imagine that the commerce and travelling facilities of France, Germany, Italy, and England, each with a population less than one half of that I have mentioned, should be so restricted. That in this age of commercial competition between countries the attempt should be made to compel marchandise by official dictation to follow a prescribed channel " is marchandise by ometal decisions to intow a preservoid chainler. It is one of those things" as Lord Dundreary would have said, "that no feller can understand." (Laughter and applause.) You have the Jubilee Bridge on your outskirts, the Kidderpur Docks in your midst and that colossal white elephant the Assam Bengal Railway. midst and that colossal white critical mind (cheers and laughter) in prospective, creations of the official mind that have not as yet come within the sphere of usefulness. It would be natural to suppose that such costly experience would have made the official bureau less self-reliant when dealing with questions made the official bureau less self-reliant when dealing with questions affecting Calentta which must always be in the main questions of commerce. But the battle has still to be fought out. And if perchance, gentlemen, it is won and the possibility averted of Lord Macaulay's 'South Sea Islander extending his travels to seat himself on Prinsep's Ghat to depict the ruins of Chowringhee, and the blown out furnaces of John King & Co,'s foundry (loud laughter) what opinion is posterity likely to hold of the end of the nineteenth century when India's commerce was dominated by gold head and a century when India's commerce was dominated by gold braid and a Woolwich training? (Laughter and applause.)

These matters, gentlemen, should be of much concern to Government for the good of the "Land we live in," as it is from the agriculture and commerce of the country that the revenues are supplied.

And, gentlemen, if India is making progress in mechanical know-ledge, she has also by the unostentatious industry of a large body of public servants (applause) risen to the pleasing position of receiving the congratulations of the President of the deputation of receiving the congraturations of the rresident of the deputation of British Association upon her practical adaptation of scientific invention. It was a pleasant corollary to Mr. P. V. Luke's lecture on field telegraphy delivered before that august assembly last September, that he should have elicited such a compliment. (Hear, hear), Since last St. Andrew's Anniversary a Medical Congress, has assembled in this city that has testified to the civilized world the existence of one of greatest benefactions that has been conferred upon the people of the "Land we live in" by the British administration. I refer to the medical relief directed by the State. (Cheers). It may be good for the "Land we live in" that it should be visited by such scientists as met at the Congress and not to be wondered at that our beautiful winter climate should attract our fellow countrymen and others in increasing numbers from the winter fogs and frosts of home. India can offer attractions from the winter togs and trosts of nome. India can oner attractions to the beau and the belle as well as to the savant and the sportsman; and in winter it is neither to be despised as a place of residence nor as a ground for exploration. (Applause). If we are round blithe and gay, it is a salutary reaction after a long period of confinement, during which we have been roasted, boiled, and stewed, to a degree, that can hardly be realized without having been experienced. (Hear, hear), It it would be extreme to characterise that experience as a writer lately heard Hong Kong described in "a monosyllabic adaptation of the ultimate destination of the incorrigibly unright-cous," (lond laughter) we could not at all events have brought ourselves during these seasoning months to chant the motto of the Dewani-Khas at Delhi. ("If there be paradise on earth, it is this, it is this"). (Applause). With depreciated silver the cost of a visit to India is not terrifying to the fortunate recipient of cost of a visit to india is not territying to the fortunate recipient of an income in gold, so long as Mrs. Monk and the management of the Great Eastern Hotel do not demand gold rents (laughter) from those who do not find accommodation with friends. The Anglo-Indian has hitherto held the enjoyable reputation of keeping open house according to his means (hear, hear), and although the latter, as heaven full well known hears for the state of the as heaven full well knows, has more frequently shrunk than increased of late years, he has not relaxed his efforts to continue to entertain the stranger within his gates. It is hard lines if by doing so he is afterwards compelled to defend himself and his income against those who he finds to his dismay have made use of his home in the nature of a caravanserai, (Cheers). Although such instances have occurred, they are fortunately few. The good fellowship of the Anglo-Indian is meant to be received in as kindly a spirit as it is given by the words of our National Poet

"But ye whom social pleasures charm, Whose heart the tide of kindness warms, Who hold your being on these terms Each aid the others Come to my bowl, come to my arms, My friends, my brothers."--(Loud cheers).

Genilemen,---In these imperfect remarks I have attempted to show that the "Land we live in," although offering many attractions, is only half developed and partially exploited. For the position she has already attained in the civilized world, the credit is due to those who make up the races of the United Kingdom. To borrow a simile of a modern statesman, India has received the benefit of the strong *agacity, staunch, through going character, sobriety, and seriousness, of the habitual temper of Scotsmen, while she has perhaps been taught by the English, to take a rider view of the political problems, and a broader conception of her Imperial deatiny, and has been sharpened by being brought into contact with the quicker, the more agile, and the more ready witted character of the Irish, who have brought their imagination and diplomacy to advance her best interests. Long may India enjoy such benefits derived from the people of the United Kingdom (Loud cheers).

AT A PENNY APIECE---£20,000.

AT A PENNY APIECE—220.000.

If you had as many pennies as there are natural holes through your skin, how in my pennies should you have?

You would have enough to make £20,000. Now figure up the holes for yourself. Yet you couldn't affind to sell them for a penny each, even in hird times. They are worth more money. These holes, or sweat glinds, pour out quarts of swent every day—water, mixed with salt and pensonans himmars. So at these holes, partly or entirely, and the skin's work is at once thrown on the lungs and kidneys. Then you fall it with some disease or other. With what disease depends on the nature and location of you we k spin.

A lady, whose name we are pensitted to mention, will not soon forget the spring of 1890. It was then that for the first time in her filepers to let them out—her feet were swollen on; and her hands were in the same condution. In the morning her face would puff up and large limps form under her eyes and on her cheeks. Then a rash made its appearance all over her body, vanishing again almost immediately, as a blush comes and goes on the face.

The suddenness of this she compares in the sting of a wasp or horner. An intense tiching accompanied it, so she could not be in bed or be quet in any position on account of it. She was in mixery night and day, and scarcely knew what to do with herself. Her legs got so painful and felt so tired she was our to it to get abour. For eighteen months (it must have seemed like as many years) she was tormented in this way.

Meanwhile she consulted two doctors, and altended successively at in this way.

Meanwhile she consulted two doctors, and attended successively at the Newcistle Infirmity and at the Dispensity. But nothing more than temporary ease came of the treatment they gave her. The doctors recommended a change of an and in August, 1891, she went to North Sunderland. She found rehef at that place, but not from the air.

Now we must get bick to the spring of 1890, and inquire what, if anything, preceded this strange outbreak. At that time, the lady says, she first felt lugaid, thed, and constantly sleepy. She was troubled with bad he duches and attacks of giddness. Her appetite failed; she could ent but little, and after eating had a feeling of weight and failness at the chest and sides. Her whole system was depressed, and the life in her appeared to sink, as the water does in a cistern where there exists a hidden leak somewhere. Then came what has already been described.

At Narth Sunderland, whither she went for a change of air, she met a gentleman named Cathcart, who expressed a most intelligent opinion of her case and advised the use of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. Convinced by his reasoning she procured a supply of this well-known remedy and began taking it.

Her latter concludes in these words: "After I had used the Syrup

Her latter concludes in these words: "After I had used the Syrup only a few days I felt a decided improvement in all respects. My appetite revived, my food digested better, and soon the rash and hungs entirely disappeared to return no more. I have since enjoyed the best of health. You are at liberty to make my statement public if you think it may be useful to others. (Signed) Mrs. Sarah Charletton, 27, John Streen, Arthur's Hill, Newcastle, February 7th, 1893."

We congratulate this lady on her recovery and thank her for allowing us to publish the above details of her experience. The doctors called her ailment nettle rash, but it was more than that. Her blood was loaded with the poisonous acids generated by indigestion and dyspepsia—the same as the poisonous of gout and of acute inflammatory theumatism. The irritated nerves of the skin produced the rash, as the clogged pores were mable to excrete the poison. The purifying power of Seigel's Syrup expelled this poison through the kidneys and bowels, and by stimulating insensible perspiration over the whole surface of the skin.

Of this disease an English physician says: "When it becomes chronic all treatment except the one which cured Mrs. Charleton.

It is a most interesting record of the life of a remarkable man -Mr II. Babington Smith, Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October.

Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October, 1895

Dr. Mookerjee was a famous letter-writer, and there is a breezy freshness and originality thout his correspondence which make it very interesting reading—Ser Alfred W. Coft, K.C.L.F., Director of Public Institution, Bengal, 26th September, (895).

It is not that aund the pressure of harassing official daties an English Civilian can find either time or opportunity to pry sugraceful a ribute to the memory of a native personality is F. H. Wo may at my rate condulty agree with Mr. Skinne that the story of Mookerjee's life, with list high), and shadow, is pregnant with lessons for trase who desire to know the real India.

No weekly paner, Mr. Skrine tells us, not even the Hindian Patriot, in a septiment days under Kristadas Pal, enjayed a degree of influence in my way upinording that which was som at mind by Reis and Rayret.

A man of Tage heart and great qualities, his death from premionia in the early spring in the List year was a distinct and nearly loss to Indian pointains, and it was an admirable idea on Mr. Skrine's participation for India, (Hombay) September 30, 1895.

It is a death a some record—The Times of Indian, (Hombay) September 30, 1895.

It is a death a side of the Indian pointal is becomes worthy of public time; it is more tarely stuffen such a life comes to be written by an Anglo-Indian and a member of the Indian Civil Service. Buy, it has come to pass that me the Lind of the Bengali Babas, the life of at least one man more Indian pointains but me the Lind of the Bengali Babas, the life of at least one man more Indian pointains bas been considered worthy of being written by in Englishman Phedradors Steindard, (Madias) September 35, 1895.

For much of the biographical in oter that issues so feerly from the press to apology is needed. Had no biography of Dr. Mookerjee, the Editor of Reis and Rayret, appeared, an exploitation would be to be utilised for A in in exploitation would be to be utilised for A in in of his remark the person they, who was easily first among native. Indian portualists, and in many respects occupied a higher plane thin they did, and looked at public affors from a different point of view from theirs, could not be suffered to sink into oblivion, without some attempt to perpetuate his memory by the usual expedient of a "hie." The difficulties common to all biographers have in this case been into all biographers have in this case been in-creased by special circumstances, not the least of which is that the author belongs to a differ-ent race from the subject. It is true that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the learned Doctor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreigners understand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assimilation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mooker-jee remained to the list a Brahman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and approval. In consequence of this, his ideal biographer would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathies, and trained like him in Western learning. If Bengal had produced such another onan as Dr. Mookeejee, it was he who should have written his life. his life.

his life.

The hiography is warmly appreciative without being needlessly landatory; it gives on the whole a complete picture of the man; and in the book there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters addressed to Di. Monkeijee are of such moror importance that they might have been omitted with advantage, but unifit have been outsted with advantage, but not a word of his nwn letters could have been spared. To say that he writes idiomanc English is to say what is short of the truty. His diction is easy and correct, clear and straightforward, without Oriental luxintance or striving after effect. Perhaps he is never so charming as when he is laying down the laws of literary firm to young aspirants to fame. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticism; it is delicate plant-socaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feu of telling a windle-be met that his productions are not would-be priet that his productions are not in the smallest degree paetry, without one may cauclude, either offending the youth or pressing his ardour.

—The Pioneer, (Allahabad) Oct. 5, 1895.

The career of "An Indian Jounnalist" as described by F. H. Skime of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting.

Mookerjee's letters are marvels of pure diction which is heightened by his nervous style.

The life has been told by Mr. Skime in a very pleasant manner and which should make it popular not only with Bengalis but with all those who are able to appreciate merit unmarred by who are able to appreciate ment unmaried by ostentation and earnestness inspoiled by harshness.—The Muhammadan, (Midras) Oci.

5, 1895. The work leaves nothing to be desired either in the way of completeness, impartiality, or lifelike portrayal of character.

Mr. Skinne deals with his interesting subject with the onfailing instinct of the biographes, Every side of Dr. Mookerjee's complex character is treated with sympathy tempered by discrimination.

Mr. Skime's narrative certainly impresses one with the individuality of a remarkable man. one with the individuality of a remarkable man. Mookerjee's own letters show that he had not only acquired a command of clear and flexible English but that he had also assumbated that study independence of thought and character which is supposed to be a peculiar possession of natives of Great Britain. His reading and the stores of his general information appear to have been, considering his opportunities, little less than marvellous. One of the first to express his condolence with the family of the decreased writer was the present Viceroy, Lord Elgin. Mookerjee appears to have won the affection not only of the diguitaries with whom he came in contact, but also of those in low estate.

the diguttaries with whom he came in contact, but also of those in low estate.

The impression left upon the mind upon laying down the hook is that of a good and alie man whose career has been graphically portrayed.—The Englishman, (Calcutta) October 15, 1895.

The career of an eminent Bengali editor, who died in 1801, throws a curious hight upon which affect the criticisms of Indian journalists on British rule.

The "Life and Letters of Dr. S. C. Monkeijee," a honk just edited by a distinguished civilian in Calcutta, takes us behind the scenes of Indian journalism.

It is a narrative, written with insight and a complete mastery of the facts, of how a clever youth gradually grew into one of the ablest leader-writers in Bengal, and still more gradually matured into one of the fairest-minded editors that western education in India has yet produced. If the training and experience which develop the journalist in England are sometimes varied, they seem in India to have an even wider range.

But the object of this notice is to show how a great Bengali journalist is snade; space forbids us to enter upon his actual performances.

""" of expression, hids us to enter upon his actual perfurmances. They will be found set forth at sufficient length, and with much felicity of expression, in Mr. Skrine's admirable monograph. It is clitaracteristic of the noble service to which Mr. Skrine belongs, that such a book should have issued from its ranks. Dr. Mookeijee was no optimist. One of his brilliant speeches contained the following sentence:—" India has neither the soil nor the elasticity enjoyed by young and vigorous communities, but present the and rucks and deserts of an effect explication, hardly stirred to a semblance of sent the and rucks and deserts of an effete civilization, hardly stirred to a semblance of life by a foreign occupation dozing over its easily-gained advantages." This was true of the pre-Mutny Iodia of 1851. If it is no longer time of the Queen's India of 1895, we own it in no small measure to Indian journalists like Dr. Mookeijee who have laboured, annul some misrepresentation. In quicken the some interpresentation, to quicken the "semblance of life" into a living reality.—The Times, (London) October 14, 1895.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SUNYASSEE. BY JAMES HUTCHINSON. (Concluded from p 555.)
CANTO THIRD.

XIV.

My journeyings, it were vain, to tell, Or where they led, or what befell ; I've watched the Ganges' infant flow, Where Konsh is clad, in endless snow, * Aye I trod the Caspian's tideless shore. And heard the Euxine's breakers roar ; + I've bowed me, in Ellora's cave, And prayed, above a Moslem's grave ; I For sure, the semblance of a shrine Must, ever, wake some thoughts divine; If pure the heart, what recks the spot? There is no place,-where God is not !

I boast not of my wanderings past, And, now, the present seems the last. A native of my loved Behar, Where the sun shines, with genial beam, Why did I seek thy wilds, Cachar I Or the marshes of the Soormah's stream? Stranger ! thou seest these wooded heights, And you thatched shed, amid the waste? Twas there, for thirty days, and nights, I dwelt, in vigil, and in fast-A mighty spirit slumbers there, Who spent a tedious life, in prayer, And, ever, since he died,

They say, that from the mountain's side. Sweet Uttur hath been seen, to flow, In you small well, below, * Aye I they may doubt; but this I know, I saw the Tiger, round me, prowl, I heard the Wolves around me howl; And, yet, they had no power to harm, For I was girt, as by a charm. Oft, as their factsteps nearer closed, Some unseen power, still, interposed, I scarce knew how ; 'tis true, men say, That o'er the good, these have no sway ; But even, if, for the guilty, sent, + I scarce could deem me innocent ; Even so ; tho' these have missed their prey, Disease, as fell, hath found its way.

. 'Tis destiny, thus urges on, When, most, we deem the act our own; Leads us unconscious to our fate, Nor shows the gulf, till all too late ; Yet deem not stranger, that I fear, Altho' perhaps, my end be near ; Oh ! I have often prayed, for death, As eagerly, as some for life : Aye I thought to rid me of my breath, When weary of this mortal strife. 'Tis true, that, even for the brave, Some terrors, still, that change must have ; Yet deem not thence, that I would buy A respite, for a single day; With none to share it with, -as now, What were a crown, upon my brow? For what, then, should I pray, in vain? To bear my miseries, again ? Drag on, in pain, a few brief years, And, at the thought of sufferings past, Moisten the dull earth, with my tears, Which must receive my dust,-at last?

The coward part was never mine, To rail, at fortune, or repine ;

The Koosn of the Hindoos in the Caucasus of the western world.

† It is said, that these indomitable fanatics and wanderers, in their mainings, sometimes go as far, as the limits here indicated.

‡ For an account of these magnificent temples or excavations, see Capitain Seeley's Wonders of Ellora.

The Hindoos and Moosulmans are now to a certain extent tolerant; they munually pay some degree of respect to each other's festivals, and they have, in like manner, in some measure adopted the customs of each other. The Hindoos now seclude their women, almost as much as the Moolummudans; on the other hand, no widow of the latter fish now thinks of taking a second husband although the prophet of Mecca himself married the widow Ayesha.

§ Behar was one of the Soubahs or Soubahdarees of the Mogul empire. It is a rich, and extensive province, situated about the middle of Gangetic India. By the natives, its climate is considered neither very hot, nor cold; it is as healthy for them, as almost any other portion of India. The real capital of the province is the overgrown city of Patna; this however constitutes a separate jurisdiction of Behar.

The nulley of Ceeber is situated an average fraction.

The valley of Cachar is situated, on our eastern frontier, between Sylhet and Munnipore; the Soormah or Barak river runs through the middle of the valley, which is marshy, and the climate moist and insalabrious, in the extreme, to the natives of Hindoosthan; although it is not so, to Europeans.

*The locality, here indicated, is situated among the wooded heights on the left bank of one of the feeders of the Sootman or Batake, about three miles above the village of Panchgong, in Cachar. The fakeers there show a small plad, which, they say, contains uttir, which has been skimmed off, frum a small well, which they point out. If not some priestly imposition, the pretended uttur is probably nothing else than a little naphtha, or perfolent. In the Burmese empire, which lies to the eastward of Cachar, it is well known, that the greater portion of the petroleum of commerce is found.

† Tigers abound in Cachar, and are exceedingly destructive, both to man and beast. The natives of the place entertain a belief, similar to that mentioned in the text, an opinion, which probably forms no inconsiderable portion of the basis of the moral code of that simple people.

Yet judge, if I have had my share Of earthy griefs, and woes, to bear. Ah I Lilloo, little did we deem, The pleasures of that fleeting dream Would fade away, so soon; Aye ! fade, ere it were noon ; And leave, behind, a track of years Blasted; tho' watered, by my tears; Fatal the hour, thou heards't my suit ; More deadly, still, hath been the fruit; What I am now, is quickly seen; But none know what, I might have been. Ah | Lilloo couldst thou see me, now, The daggled locks, upon my brow, My sunken eye, and quivering frame, Thou couldst not deem, I were the same ; Thou couldst not guess this haggard shade, To be the wreck,-which thou hast made ! I wrong her, Stranger ! for the guilt, And deep the guilt, was mine alone ; By me 'twas, that her blood was spilt, By me, that deed of darkness done. XVIII.

My soul is fluttering, in my breast,
As it would fly,—or be at rest;
My reason wanders, thou mayst see,
And C shall, soon, have ceased to be.
No Lilloo! I if even now the cup
Of happiness were offered up,
Aye! fauly, freely, proffered forth,
O'eiflowing, to my burning lip,
As freely, would I dash, to earth,
The charmed draught, if it should be Linked, with forgetfulness of thee;
If only for the hour, which death
May spare me, yet, this fleeting breath.

Our thousand gods, alas I have given No promise of an after heaven;* I ask it not ; my sole request Is rest-for-ever welcome, rest; But, when I think of thee, my love I own, my thoughts, oft, point above. I envy not, the Moor, his toys, His Housies, and his promised joys; The' every tongue should whisper rest, They could not bull my troubled breast, And tuneless, were the sweetest song, Unless, from thine own silver tongue. To some, perhaps, these joys were foir, I prize them not ;---nor seek to share ; Without thee,-they were idle all, A gilded show, that soon would pall. XX.

But, if the Christian's hope be true
Of after life, Oh I it were sweet,
To think, that we again might meet,
With pure, and spotless hearts, anew,
And love, without its guilt, renew;
If I could deem that promise sure,
What penance would I not endure;
And yet, they say, it needs it not,
If, with a contrile spirit, sought;
Their tale seems strange, and stranger still,
One God should rule, with uncheck'd will;
Yet, I have tried its truth to scan,
And still, methuks, there is but ONE;

But true or false, 'tis now too late
To struggle, with a wayward fate;
Yet I happy they, who hold a creed,
Can cheer the heart, in day of need,
Oh I it were much, to know that bliss,
If only, in an hour, like this;
Tho' now, with scarce that space to live,
My hoarded thousands I would give;
If, but to hope, that I, once more,
Might meet thee,—on their promised snore.

XXI.

Even now, as thro' a misty cloud, I saw her, in her dripping shroud; And often, thus, her form appears, As, when emerging from the deep, Her eyelids closed, as if in sleep, Yet drooping, as with unshed tears!

TAMENT

YES I she is dead, who lived for me, Tho' sweet the smile, that lingers yet, So like—her own, it well might be, But yet, for hers,—how fixed, and set.

Yes! death is here,—her raven hair Is lifeless all, about her brow, And that was eloqueut, and fair, As marble pale,—'us colder now.

Her eyes are closed, as if in sleep, Their finges curtain all, below, Their lids but droop,—as if to weep, In pity, at some dieam of woe.

Oh! lift them not,—in mercy, spare
My breaking heart, the dreadful sight;
The soul, the spirit, is not there,
That beamed, that sparkled, in their light.

But she is gone; what do I here?
The snn, that warmed my lonely breast,
Hath set,—nor left a ray to cheer;
'Tis time,—that I should be at rest.

And then, away, her shade will glide,
Or pause, as now, and seem to chide,
And beckon me, with outstretched hand,
To follow, to some dreaming land.
Nay! doubt me not;—I come! I come!
To seek thee, even beyond the tomb.

XXII.

Haste, Stranger! to Bood'h-Gyah's pile, And there, within the convent aisle, My wealth is hid, an ample store, Go, give it, to the poor;—*
Howe'er men doubt of caste, and creed, There's none will blame the prous deed, That stills the hapless captive's moan, Or soothes the dying weetch's groun,

Then give it to the poor!

"Is strange! this hour, or feared, or dated Should ever find us, unprepared,
And I could wish, some farther space.
Had yet be given me, to retrace.

The darker portions of my fate;
But that, thou seest, is now too late;
And, if I am not, what I ought,
Be theirs the blame, whose malice sought.

^{*} The Hindoos believe, in the transmigration of the soul, and as this, according to their belief, will have to pass through an indefinite number of terrestrial forms, and transmitations, before it has arrived at such a degree of perfection and putity, as to be incorporated, or associated with the Godhead, their religion fauls to inspire the mind, at the hour of death with any degree of comfort or confidence. To this, the text must be understood to allude.

^{*} From this, it would appear, that the Sunnyassee never did belong to the monastery at Boodly-Gyah, but that he was merely a noviciate, as it were. When a man becomes a Hindoo ascetic, all ties of consangumity are broken, and cease to operate; at first he is a Chelah or disciple hunself, and as such inherits from his teacher or superior; in the course of time, he comes to have his own chelahs or disciples, and whatever wealth he may acquire, and leave, is inherited by them.

To deem, the furrow, on my brow,
Was ploughed by guilt, and not by woe.
Their tale was false;—but that they knew
It was enough,— hey wished it true;
And they or systil, my mane assail.
What heeds it me,—yes it were well,
Another time, to be more kind,
Another time, to be less blind,
Nor drive a brother to offend,
They scarce would seem to wish to mend.

XXIII.

This week of passion, guef, and care, Is scarcely fit a thought to share;
Yet once, it was my wish, and hope
To sleep, upon the far hill-top,
That looks oe'r Chirkee's well-known plam, *
And o'er Bood'h-Gyah's uch domain;
But here!—that last delusion ends;—
Then give my ashes to the winds;
Then none will sny, with jucinid tread,
Here sleeps, he, or here tests the dead.
Unthinking foul! a few years must,
Lay him too, with th' oblivious dust.

He passed away, nor left a trace Of kindred, lineage, or of race, And we will hope, that rest may gain, He sought, so long, on earth, in vain.

WEEKLYANA.

DR. Fitzedward Hall again writes regarding "An Indian Journalist:—
"It is to Reis and Rayyet that I am chiefly indebted, now-a-days, for my information regarding what is going on in Bengal. I always look forward to its arrival, and my interest in it, keen hitherto, will in future be more so, now that I know the share you have in its conspicuously able management.

That justice has been done, and through a medium wholly unprecedented, to the memory of the lamented Dr. Mookerjee, is, for India, a most anspicious sign of the times. A generation ago nothing like it could have been looked for. Talent, however great, if independence had been conjoined with it, would then have counted for nothing.

ANOTHER English notice of the book ;--

"Mr. F. H. Skime has rendered a friendly service to the memory of Dr. Sambhu Ch. Mookerjee by bringing out his 'life, letters, and correspondence' under the title of 'An Indian Journalist,' Dr. Mookerree was of pure Brahman stock, being a lineal descendant, in the thirty-fourth generation, from the celebrated poet Subarsha, author of the Sanskrit epic Nashadhacama. In spite of a strangely chequered career which began with his school days and continued for many years while he was on the staff of the 'Hindoo Patriot' and other papers, and made a name as a reviewer, till he started, in 1882, ' Reis and Ruyyer,' a weekly paper devoted to politics, literature and social questions, which has maintained to the end of his life-and we may add, is maintaining under the able editorship of his successor-a general reputation for literary finish, breadth of view, and impartiality. In the editorial chair of this paper he found full scope for the utilisation of his extensive acquaintance with English and Indian literature, his dry humour, his sober judgment. Though a staunch Hinde, he kept himself free from social prejudices, he was allied in close friendship with the late Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, and on terms of intimacy with many English gentlemen of influence. What impresses the reader of the correspondence most favourably is the high appreciation in which Dr. Mookerjee appears to have been held by all with whom he was brought in contact. Books like this, will go far in breaking down the social brities still existing between the Hindus and the dominant race."—Luxic's Ortental List, Vol. vol., Nos. 10 and 11, Oct.-Nov., 1895.

THE National Hungarian Millennin Exhibition to be held at Budapest between May and October, 1896, is thus announced in the Gazelle of India:

GOLD has been found in German Africa. A German geologist has traced an anriferous quartz teef four uniles in length, forty uniles to the west of Tanga.

AFTER bitter experience, China has awakened to modern civilization. An imperial edict orders the construction of a double line of railway from Pekin to Tientsin, at an estimated cost of three inilhon taels.

SIR Donald Stewart has been given a fresh term on the India Conncil. A special telegram in the Englishman reports that S r Charles Elliott will likely be admitted to that Council in view of possible reforms in the Land Revenue Settlement.

DELAY is not always dangerous. It may prove an advantage. The Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad, on the unanimous verdict of the jury, sentenced three persons, but of four, to capital punishment for dacoity attended with murder of one Hukha Varshang committed in December 1893. In August last, the Bombay High Court confirmed the sentence. The prisoners next petitioned the Local Government, which declined to interfere, and the execution was fixed for the 22nd of August. It was then urged that certain important evidence was not admitted at the trial. The day of execution was postponed. A long correspondence begin ending with a reference by the Bombay Government to the Government of India. The Bombay Government has now decided that, using to the delay in carrying out the sentence of death, it should be committed to one of transportation for life.

THE Legal Practitioners' Bill had the earliest and earnest support of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Puipib. The Lahore Chief Court Bar also recorded a resolution suggesting its extension to all classes of legal practitioners. Echoing the cry from other parts of India, that Bar Association has just rescanded its former recommendation and has Resolved that, as past legislation had been a failure, and the proposals of the Bill offer no hope of succeeding in their object, the Act should be repealed altogether, and that it should be left to the different bodies of legal practitioners to manage their own affairs, as in England. It was, we believe, the Librie advocater, who, a year before the Act was passed, had agreed among themselves not to employ or encourage tonis, and found it advantageous in that their income was doubled. An accession of new blood disturbed the arrangement and law brokers began to flourish when the Act was passed to make them law breakers.

^{*} Chirkee is a very small village, situated half-way, between Sherghortee and Gyah; about a mile to the west of it, there is a rugged circular hill, that rises abruptly from the plain. It is covered with brushwood, and has altogether a very picturesque appearance. This hill is seen from a considerable distance, all around, and is probably the one alluded to; I am thus particular, in case the inhabitants of the sacred city should hereafter wish to raise a pillar or obelisk, on the site indicated, to the memory of the Sunyassee.

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS.

ALL the Ambassadors, also the Turks, it ts said, generally approve of Sir Philip Currie's action in receiving Said Pasha at the British Embassy. The Sultan sent different Ministers and his Private Secretary to try and induce Said Pasha to quit the British Embassy, promising immunity from any harm. He, however, stoutly and repeatedly refused to comply, and Sir Philip Currie likewise declined to persuade him. Her Mijesty's despatch vessels Cockatrice and Imogene, lying in the Bosphorus, were surrounded by Turkish Police boats all Thursday night, fearing that Said Pasha would attempt to take refuge on board. The bonts were withdrawn at daylight, Sir Philip Currie has protested against the proceeding. M. Nelidoff, the Russian Ambassador, had an audience of the Sultan on Dec. 8, and presented a letter from the Czar. A change in the Turkish Ministry is expected, and Said Pasha, the ex-Foreign Minister, who is known as a Kurd, will, it is stated, be Grand Vizier. Next day, Said Pasha returned home. Before leaving the English Embassy, he wrote to Sir Philip Currie, stating that, owing to his being so repeatedly urged by the Sultan, he was obliged to abandon his intention of going abroad to recruit his health, and return home to prove his appreciation of the Sultan's assurances that he continued in his Majesty's favour. He states, however, that his health will not permit of his resuming office. After bitter, reluctant delays an Imperial irade has been issued by the Sultan, authorising the extra guardships of the Powers, It appears that the Russian Ambassador appealed to the Sultan to avert an ultimatum from the Pawers. His Majesty yielded. The British and Italian extra guardships passed the Dardanelles on Dec. 12, for Constantinople.

THE death is announced of Mr. George Augustus Sala, the famous journalist and one of the masters of the English language. He has not survived long his late sad experiences.

THE Times, in an article on the cotton duties, concludes that India has a strong case which has brought conviction to the best men of both parties, and that it will be very difficult for Lancashire to shake that conviction. Lord George Hamllton received the Manchester deputation on Wednesday. In reply, he said that the present amtagonism of interests was a dauger to the unity of the Empire. Indian finance, he said, had slightly improved during the year, and he sincerely hoped that it would continue to improve, and thus permit of the remission of the cotton duties. He assured the deputation that their grievance would be the first for removal if the finances improved, and said that it was not advisable to give a final answer until he was prepared to act, and he was bound to allow Bombay its full say, and give fair play to both sides. He promised to submit the views of the deputation to the Indian Government, and would ask them to accelerate their reply.

MAJOR Toselli, with 1,200 Native troops and 20 Italian officers, was surprised and surrounded by Menelek's army, numbering 20,000 at Ambagali, General Arimondi, while advancing to relieve Major Toselli, was forced to retreat to Makalle, after a battle in which Menelek lost heavily. Three of Major Tosellis officers and 300 men joined General Arimondi. Seventeen Italian officers and forty non-commissioned officers besides a Mountain Battery with Major Toselli are supposed to have been massacred. The Italian Government has ordered the despatch of reinforcements numbering four thousand men from Naples. It has every confidence in General Barateri, and the Italian positions, notably at Makalle; are strongly fortified and victualled in case of a siege. The fighting was desperate and lasted for six hours, the Italians being eventually crushed by vastly superior numbers. Two or three thausand Shoans were killed. The latest report is that Major Toselli was killed at the beginning of the battle, and that the Shoans murdered many wounded Italians. The Italian forces have evacuated Adowa and are centering upon Adigrat. where preparations are being made to resist the Shoans, who number about thirty five thousand. The defence made by Major Toselli was most heroic. When all was lost, though the numbers against him were overwhelming, he valuantly led the final charge, thus enabling the remnants of his force to escape and join General Arimondi's force, which merely checked the advance of the Shoans without fighting. Upwards of two thousand Native troops fell at Ambagali. Three Italian Battalions and a quantity of materiel leave for Massawah on the 17th instant and two Battalions on the 27th instant. The Italian Budget Committee have approved an extra grant of four million lire for military expenses in Abyssinia.

Kabiraj Gangi Persei Sanis deud Baum 1823, m. a voltage near Viktampore, District Dioca, he breaked his list on Monday, December 9 at Caloud i, on the trinks of the sacred Burgo ohi. As in early age, after tos investime with the second thread, (on a Vedya carries a sacred thread like a Bridining, he sinded Sinskiit Grammer and interatore, at Sonarang in Vikiampore, siting at the feet of the leaned Pundit Kund Sanoman. The latter had a large number of disciples to teach and feed. His toronge was extremely limited, and each disciple had to be on our with only that and sometimes even quarter rations. Gauga Prayad studied the Ayurveila under the tuition of his father, the celebrated Nilambar Seo who in his day was the foremost of Kabirajes at Calcutti. The Kabirajl practice in former times was hampered by many serious obstacles, chief amongst which was the absence of ready made medicines, especially, the costler ones, for immediate use. The custom was to prepare the required medicine after the physician had been called in. The preparition often took many days, so that the patient sometimes succumbed to the disease before the physician could render him any help. Gang's Prasad's father, Nilambar, resolved to keep in hand a good stock of Aymvedic medicines. He had to incur a large pecunitry outly, but his forethought was soon crowned with the best results to both himself and his patients. His practice rose by leaps and bounds, till he topped all the Kabirajes of Cilcuita. Linge as his earnings were, he spent freely to chartry, so that his popularity knew no bounds. Ganga Prasad commenced practice when he was 22 years of age. At first he was only his fither's assistant. The venerable Nil unbar, however, soon died, leaving no money to his soo. The latter had to push his way through the world. The European system of once was then highly popular. Kibiriji nid losi ground before its formidable rival Ganga Prasad, however, knew the value of his art and had great selfreliance. Silently but surely his prictice and popularity extended-Within a very few years he succeeded in coming to the front rank of Ayurvedic practitioners. Following the example set by his father, he invested his savings in manufacturing such medicines and medicinal oils as are frequently in requisition. His medicinal oils proved an mexhaustible mine of wealth. His success also in the cure of disease was remarkable.

Gauga Prasad was a rigid Hindu. He resembled his father in charity. He had a large number of pupils to keep. His benefactions to learned Brahmans on all ceremonial occasions were very large. He carefully excluded those that are stained by accepting the gifts of excasted families of wealth. During the prosecution of the Bangabashi, he readily came forward as security for the accused in a heavy sum, after almost every one among the Garbhadhanist Rajalis and Rijalings, so loud to their demonstration of the Consent Bill, had desterously refused the poper of the poor fellows about to be dragged to Hajat. The may discavered his meale by that one step. He had the courage of ats convictions. He has left a large fortune to his hens, and in my legacies to kinsmen. Attogether, his death is a loss, almost irreparable, to the cause of the Aymvedic method of care.

THE death of M. Buthelemy St. I. line is a distinct loss to the fearned world. Both as a classical o tiotal and Ocientalist he was in the front rank and enjoyed a word wide reputation. His literary fame eclipsed that of his political a avily of early years. He edited the Journal des Savants for many years with distinguished ability, His first great work on Sankhy c phi osophy established his fame as an Orientalist on a solid foundation. It excited the admination of the great German Paudits. His greatest work-a complete translation into French of Austotle's volume us remains-was concluded by his "Problemes d'Aristore" in two vocumes. It is a marvel of accurate learning and patience. Begin in 1832, the translation was finished in 1891. It would seem that he had been spared by his Maker for completing his great task, for he lived to a good old age. His concluding volumes on Aristotle are, perhaps, a master-piece. The authenticity of the Problems had been doubted by some scholars. M. St. Hilaire, in a grand dissertation, critically examined the evidence bearing on the subject, and showed that the doubt had no ground to stand upon. No one had studied the works of the Stagirite with greater care than he. His opinion, therefore, on the question of the genuineness of the Problems is entitled to the highest respect. Tae I tional machinery provided by the British Government. The supremacy word problems, as used by Aristotle, means questions and answers not freward for discussion and solution. They are in the form of questions and answers. The 38 sections of the collection include magetice $52 questions relating to all soits of subjects, meay of them extremely in date and curious. The titles of some of his sections will give a general idea of the character of the marters dealt with, Madical questions, relating generally to diseases; on sweat, wine and drinking, fatigne, sympathy, shivering, the voice; good and bid smells; Temperature; Mathematics, Astronomy; Admitte and Inaminiate things; Purlosophy; musical Hirmony; Sec-water; mineral waters; air; the wind; Fear and Conrage; l'emperance; Justice; Intelligence; the Eyes; the Eus; the Nose; the Month; Couch; the Face; Colours; these form the topics of this great work. The speculations, in some ins auces, coincide wanderfully with the discoveries of modern science. Here is a book which, if translated into Bengali, is sure to be deviated by Bengali readers to coasequence of many points of resemblance with the surmises of the R shis of ancient India.

M. St. Hilling took an acrive inferest in the English translation of the M thabbarata published by Pratapa Chundra Roy. It was through his influence and recommendation that the French Government went out of its way for subsidizing that work, disregarding its sereal chinacter and, therefore, its incompleteness at the time of the grant, and also its price of publication, vis., a foreign country. Although a labourer or the field of ancient Indian literature, M. St. Hilane was not pudifferent to the currents of modern thought in this country. He had a poor opinion of the work of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. He did not live to review the grand poem in Sanskitt of Pandu Ram Nath Tarkaratua in the Journal des Savants, but in a private letter to the English translator of the Mahabharata he expressed his admiration for the genius the of Pandit and his marvellous command of the dead topque of the Rishis.

FIE following extract from Harpers Monthly Magazine will be read with interest in this country as affinding a fair idea of the general ignorance of India under which a considerable partion of the British public still labours.

"With the spield of education among subordinate castes, the supremery of the Brahmin, and the exclusive monoply in matters intellectual which he formerly copyed, are rapidly waning. The class which seems to have in de the most capital out of the new order of things is the samewhat loosely defined, but widely distributed, portion of the Huidu population, known as Bengalis or Bahus. When they are conservarize enough to cling to the primitive costimue of their forefathers, which was evidently not designed to foster the vice of vanity among its wenters, there is little difficulty in distinguishing them from other subjects of the Queen-Eugress. These orthodox Bahus wear nothing on their heads to cover their clinest-copied stocks of black hair, although they is notly carry a white cotton mabrella; their principal although they usually carry a white cotton umbrella; their principal girunent is along piece of white diagery, called a dhott, leaving their arons and legs bire, and went something after the fashion of a Roman toga. Other characteristic features of their costume are the low patenttoga. Other characteristic tenties of their custome are the more predicted the shoes, and white socks which have a tendency to hang down, leaving visible. In ge surfaces of fat hrawn shanks, as these people are normed to be of ford and pointly both. Gold-immed spectrales often add a root of modern' actuality' to this somewhat archaic costume. There is a previous being mong the more progressive members of this class, but it leaving an costume, of wild its node common, a sort of commonies between the diess of the underguised. Bubit and the Evolution as who first ten in the direction of worldby success. As compromise between the dress of the undisquised Bibn and the Englishmen, is the first step in the direction of windly success. As a recent cutic remarks, 'In as small constreas getting off a train-cat, I have repeatedly observed that Bahas in coats and trousers risk their lives in a thing leap, while others in dhoft and hare feet insist on the coastingong, before they trust their previous persons to the ground.' Whatever may be his dies, be trust in risk of being unstaken for a member of day of the military castes, and an case of war it would not hilly never occur to the ribing powers to ruse an army from among this industrious and profife section of the community. But in a country where everything has been specialised from the very beginning, noting seems to respect this days the less on account of its predictive position. And yet some of their bandis, with a historic name, lately remarked, 'You can no more make a gentleman out of a Bengah than carve a fine image out of rotten would.' And as a general thing the Benguit will bely more on the world of an Englishman than on thin cauve a fine image out of ritten wood? And as a general thing the Bength will rely more on the word of an Englishmin than on that of his fellow-countymen. But, on the other hand, it cannot be deuted that these people represent much of the brain and intelligence of native Tachi. They eith papers and are born agitators, citicusing the policy of the Government, and saying whatever it pleases them to think upon political matters in their societies as well as in their journals, for they are usually endowed with the gift of volubility and rapid interince and freely express their minds in 'high falutins' and more or less Shakespearian English."

There is no egregious mistake in the statement that the supremacy of the Brahman and his monopoly in matters intellectual are rapidly waning, for others than Brahmans are availing themselves of the educaof the Brahman, however, as Brahman,-that is, irrespective of his intellectual acquisitions and piety,-is not yet a thing of the past. The Brahman, if only he happens to be a decent individual, still receives the bow of worship from every Kshatriya or Vaisya or Sudra that has not broken with his caste or religion. The Brahman's feet are still touched with reverence on every ceremonial occasion. Those among the Brahmans that are engaged in the pursuit of the ancient learning of their country, still receive gifts of honour, as their sires and grandsires before their did, on occasions of religious rites. They are still the spininal guides and preceptors of the people. Some more centuries will have to elapse before the Brahman ceases to be honoured in India by the individuals of the other orders among Hindus. From the minner, again, in which the writer speaks of "the somewhat loosely defined but widely distributed portion of the Hindu population known as Bengalis or Babus" that are making "the most capital out of the new order of things," it is plain that he will be filled with surprise when he learns that the Bengahs or Babus include a large number of Brahmans; that Bengal is only a geographical division of India, having proper boundaries; that the word Bengali implies in racial and not a caste distinction. The dilettantes and back writers in the press who take upon themselves to instruct the British public in matters Indian, have yet to learn, the very alphabet of Indian ethnology, caste, and even geography. With these writers the Bengali is always a butt of ridicule, and whole columns of maccuracies are poured on his devoted head to excite merriment at his expense. Living as the Bengali does in a hot climate, he cannot cover himself with cloth as thick as is worn by the people of colder climes. His ideas of decency, again, are different from those of other people, His durbar dress, however, is perfectly unobjectionable. That he is not enrolled in the army can scarcely be his fault, considering how the Government has repeatedly disallowed his prayer for entering the aimy as a career. Every Bengali cannot fight, even as every. Englishman cannot shoulder the musket or manage the steed-Macaulay himself could not ride or manage a pony. It is, however, not true that there are no Bengalis who can fight. There are entire castes in Bengal which can formish excellent materials for regiments capable of standing side by side with the bravest troops of the world. Can the writer name the Pundit to whom he refers as his authority for his libel on the Bengali character? He is probably none else than the renowned Ramghose Mookerjee whom this instructor of the British public had met with in a Rulway train if he had ever been to India or with whom some friend of his has possibly exchanged a letter or two. It is very much to be deploted that such malicious cancatures are regarded by the conductors of English newspapers and periodicals worthy of their columns of pages. The mischief already caused by ignorance and malice is very great. The Indian press should never lose the opportunity of setting the British public right by exposing all mischievous defractors.

LORD ELGIN ON ADDRESSES.

In reply to an address of welcome presented to him at Beneras, Sir A P. MacDonnell is credited with having said,--" My reason in taking a tour through the districts is not personal gratification, but the desire to bring myself into touch with the officers, public bodies, and privite individuals who make up the State organisation." Although these words embody an obvious truth, yet the necessity for their utterance will be admitted by those who have carefully read Lord Elgin's Poona speech. If Lord Elgin's view be correct of what the contents should be of addresses of welcome presented to high officers of State, the utility of official tours upon which so much stress is laid in this country would seem to disappear. The fruits are already being reaped of the Poona deliverance. The Mahajan Sabha of Madras desired to present an address of welcome to the Viceroy. The draft was submitted to the local Government which took objection to the paragraphs referring to the increase of military expenditure at a time of financial embarrassment caused by the ever-increasing loss by exchange, the retention of Chitral, the adoption of a severe policy towards the agricultural classes by reviving settlement operations with, as it would seem, the pre-determined object of increasing the revenue from land, and the interested agitation in England for the repeal of the cotton duties. The address urged the desirability of economy, so that the savings effected might be devoted to the relief of the tax-payer " or in feeding the departments directly beneficial to the public, such as Public Works, Education, Sanitation, etc., or in carrying out those urgent administrative reforms for which the public have been some years clamouring, such as the separation of judicial and executive func-tions." The Madras Government decided that unless these references were omitted, the address could not be allowed to be presented. The Mahajan Sabha held a meeting and resolved that, under the cir-cumstances, no address should be presented, for the suppression of the paragraphs would materially detract from the value of the document. From his point of view Lord Elgin might be pleased to direct that addresses of welcome should not be converted into instruments for challenging the general policy of Government, but the question is of what value would such occasions be if the privilege be taken away from the people of laying their gievances at the feet of authority? Of what value would their tours be if officials were to close their ears against all complaints and hear nothing but the praises of the administration? Asiatic monarchs and even Subordinate Chiefs have their paid bords and encomiasts for loudly proclaiming their virtues not only on all ceremonial occasions but also within the inner apartments of their palaces and mansions for awaking them from their slumbers. However agreeable the voice of praise, the listeners never expect other throats to utter it. They never hope for eulogies save from those whose vocation it is to eulogise. The difference, however, is very great between Asiatic despotism or weakness and European statesmanship based on superior culture. Despising the encomiums prompted by interest or pusillanimity, statesmen should read their history in a nation's eyes. A large quantity of eye-wash is used by subordinate officials for tricking superiors into an impression of general prosperity when the fact is otherwise. The opportunities in India are very rare, for those engaged in the task of ruling, of learning anything directly from the lips of the ruled. From their very nature, the addresses of public bodies are drafted with great reserve. Their tone is always respectful. Factionsness is rigidly avoided. To discourage even such expressions of opinion implies an impatience of criticism that is incompatible with liberal statesmuship. If the policy criticised really admits of justification, officials should welcome such criticism for the opportunity offered them for explanation. It is only when the task becomes difficult of hiding the struggling pangs of conscious truth that such expressions of opinion become annoying. Perhaps, Lord Elgin is too sincere a statesman to be capable of quenching the blushes of ingenuous shame while justifying the retention of Chitral and pleading the increase of military expenditure and of loss by exchange as difficulties in the way of relief to the agricultural classes, of the extension of Public Works, and the separation of judicial and excutive functions. He should remember that stopping the expression does not kill the grievance outright; that statesmanship consists in meeting criticism openly and replying to it with vigour.

All this may be admitted, and yet the view, it may be argued, propounded by the Viceroy may be strictly correct. In refusing addresses distasteful to him for their contents, the Viceroy does not interfere with the right of the subject to petition the crown or its representatives. Every private individual has the right to refuse receiving and answering unpleasant communications addressed to him. The situation would be truly deplorable of the Viceroy if this right were denied to him. Unfortunately, the Viceroy's progress through the empire is invested with a political character which can by no means be eliminated from it. The people have always been allowed to approach him on such occasions not only with expressions of loyal welcome as befit every good subject of the Queen, but with also a tale of their wants and respectful suggestions for showing how those wants may be obviated or met. Herein lies the difficulty of the situation. Lord Elgin's predecessors have borne the infliction, each with as much grace as he could command. Addresses have before now been even refused. The reasons, however, had never been formally enunciated. The desire, publicly expressed, of stopping the free expression of opinion in addresses is a distinct departure from established practice. Rules have never been promulgated defining the principles that should regulate the frame of such public utterances. On the other hand, it has been always understood that in welcoming or bidding farewell to Viceroys and provincial Governors, public bodies have all along been allowed to make references to political questions of the hour and freely criticise them from their stand-point of view. Instances are not wanting of Viceroys betraying an impatience of criticism by even undignified exhibition of temper. But Lord Elgin's is undoubtedly the first attempt to lay down a rule as to what the limits should be of topics introduced in public addresses. In preventing excursions into the wide field of administrative policy, it seems that Lord Eigin's wish is that nothing should occur to disturb the pleasure or harmony of Viceregal progresses through the empire; that the head of the administration should everywhere be greeted with only expressions of layalty and joy and contentment with the existing order of things; that only faces beaming with inward satisfaction, with not a line of cark and care, should be presented on such cocasions. The rides and progresses of Queen Elizabeth, it is said, were regulated up in such a principle, for the police had especial instructions to prevent all sorts of ugly, deformed, and ill-dressed people from living the streets in hope of obtaining a sight of the Sovereign. None but well clad and handsome specimens of humanity him in confessing that though near the rose, still I am not the rose, were allowed to become objects of the Queen's but I have done what I can to remedy this deficiency by bringing gaze., The partiality of Queen Bess, however, for handsome countenances, was productive of no mischievous consequences to her people. Unfortunately, the new kind of addresses with which Lord Elgin wishes to be greeted, is not altogether innocent. The check proposed on the free utterance of thoughts is very much to be deplored. That check is one of direct consequences of our forward military policy as also of the ministerial coqueting for Laucashire

A MUNICIPAL GRIEVANCE. (A telegraphic correction)

REGRET the publication in your esteemed paper of 7th December of a letter headed "a Municipal Grievance." The site of the old strughter house, smalle at the horder of the butchers' quarter, was selected by a special Sub-Committee and approved by Dr. Zurab, Changing of the Municipality, and by the then Sanitary Commissioner. The cues of the anunids, he ud from the Uriva, Babu's garden, house situate at a little distance, in ide him feel kind and ask the former Board to remove it. They declined but resolved at a meeting that if a similar slaughter-house, built on a piece of land of equal dimensions as the existing one, on a sife equally convenient to the butchers could be guaranteed, they would have no objection to the removal. Nobudy came forward. An appeal was made to the Divisional Commissioner through the Migistrate which was rejected. Dr. Gregg, Sanitary Commissioner, inspected the sharghter-house but never suggested its removal. The Baba subsequently having agreed to bear the cost of a new land and slaughter house, the Commissioners (the old body) agreed, according to their former promise, to remove it, and they also acquired land for the purpose. No Government or public thanks necessary for personal convenience. Sarry to find people that dare mislead editors like yourself.

ST. ANDREW'S DINNER.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT'S REPLY TO THE TOAST "THE GUESTS."

I have been entrusted with the honour of returning thanks on Thave been entracted with the module of returning tanks of the guests for the welcome given them to night by the Scotchmen of Calcutta, and I rise with great pleasure to perform that duty. It is no mere formality to say that we who have enjoyed your hospitality have been greatly impressed by two things—the generous abundance with which the tables have been I ten for the retreshment of the inner man, and the liberal provision of intellectual recreation which has been made in the interesting speeches to which we have listened. Those who are old babitum of the place must be gratified by observing not only the growth of the number who attend this festival, but also the increased warmth of the spirit of friendliness which it evokes, (hear, hear) and we congratulate you on the existence of the strong national feeling which binds you together, and also on the good reasons which justify your pride in the name of Scotland. In these cosmopolitan days when philosophers debate whether parint-ien is more akm to a vice or to a virtue, and the Custom House prices it as an article ripilly rising in value- for my friends till me that a sprig of heather which list year pul one anna as duty his this year been assessed at three--(laughter), we who are not philosophies do well to had every occision that strengthens the not philosophers do well to hall every occision that strengthens the ties which bind us to our dear mother hand, (cheers) and which forces us in this country to appreciate the bonds of blood and race and good fellowship. (Renewed applause.) Your St. Andrew's Dinner is eminently such an observables, and we trust that for years to come generations of guests like ourselves may empty the hispitality of generations of Scotchmen like yourselves, and admire the warming of ink hand enthusiasm and the spirit of good-will with a suggest of the high particular conference. (Cheers.)

mire the warm'n of national enthusiasm and the spirit of good-will which meetings of this kind rend to engender. (Cheers.)

Thus far I have spoken on behalf of the guests whom I represent; but I have also to acknowledge on my own behalf the very flattering remarks made by Mr. Henderson regarding Lady Riliott and mixelf, and the special feeling which has induced you replace me in this position to night. I should like, therefore, at this point to ask my fellow guests to reat themselves, as the remainder of my observations will be of a general character, and I know there is nothing more tiring than to listen, standing, to a lengthy speech. is nothing more tiring than to listen, standing, to a lengthy speech. Mr. Henderson has remarked feelingly on my mistortune in not being a Scotchman, though I bear a border name, and I join with with me to-night an A .- D .- C, who is privileged to wear the Highland Light Infantry uniform, and I can congratulate you on the fact that my successor will be free from the defect which attaches to myself as he is as sound a Scotchman as any in the room.

(Applause). Mr. Henderson has also given a summary of the (Applause). Mr. Henderson has also given a summary of the work carried out by the Bengal Government, and I understand that you desire that this entertainment should be your farewell to the returing Lientenant-Governor, and that you invite me, in replying, to go outside of the ordinary subjects, and to give to you, through you to the public, some account of my stewardship during the last five years. (Cheers.) It is, I believe, recognised by you all that a Lieutenant-Governor cannot address you with anything like the authority of a Viceroy, and cannot enter on an exposition of principles of Imperial policy such as you have been so fortunate as to listen to in former years; but it is still thought that the internal and domestic working of the Bengal Government may supply topics which possess interest and which deserve com-memoration at a time when the reins of Government are changing

In accepting this invitation I feel that you will not expect me to speak of the intricacies of civil government as it affects the great mass of the Native population, but that I should confine myself to those sides on which it touches, or is touched by the interests and welfare of the great body of the European community --- those in Calcutta in the first place, and in the second place those who live in the mufassal, but are represented here. Even when limited in this way the subject is a very large one, and I feel sure that you will forgive morif on such a night as this I confine myself to the principal points of contact and to the most important measures regarding which the Government and the European body have muonally influenced each other. And the first point I am bound to dwell on is the great, and I am glad to be able to say the increasing trade of the place (Applause.) No Lieutenant-Governor would be worthy of his office if he did not see in that trade an object which in the interests of all classes of the community, whether resident in the capital or in the outlying parts of the province, he is bound to do all in his power to encourage and develop. I am indebted to Mr. Skrine for figures which show that while the imports of Calcutta during the last five years have stood unchanged at about 25 crores, the exports have risen from 35 to 45 crores. This is a large increase, and the sub-ject is one on which I might easily dilate at a length disproportioned to what I have to say on other points, and I only make one or two remarks here. The first is, that our figures do not bear out the complaints made in England about the effect on the Manchester trade produced by the imposition of the cotton duties. (Hear, hear.) Cotton imports have stood at 14, 13, 12, 16, and 15 crores during the five-year period, and in the current year they are crores during the nve-year period, and in the current year they are likely to exceed the maximum on record. Another point is that it is the imports of luxuries, such as sugar, tobacco, and spirits, which show a tendency to increase, and that local production is to some extent supplementing the import of necessaries. As to exports, their growth is mainly due to the great expansion of jute cultivation and manufacture, and the levelopment of internal trade is chiefly the result of the attentio pail to the improvement of communications and the removal of obstructions.

As regards this matter the two chief po its at which the Bengal Government has in my time come in contact with the trade of the place are the port and the railway system. With regard to the port, the most important event has been the orrang of the Kidderpore Docks and the burden laid upon the tyle of Calcutta by the charge for interest on the expenditure. This is a matter on which I have been in constant and anxions ommunication with the Port Commissioners, and I went so far as ... let it be known that if the voice of the trading community of Hed for such action, the Government would be prepared to use the power which the law gives it of compelling ships to enter the 10 acks instead of lying in the tiver or at the Jetties; but your expresentatives generally agreed that such a step was inadvisable, a lit was not taken. By degrees, however, the facilities afforded by the Docks have become more and more appreciated, and I learn that during the last twelve months the receipts have conalled the actual working expenses. A project is now before the Port Commissioners, under which all export cargo will be taken in at the Docks, and which if approved, will result in a near remouth to equilibrium; and the Supreme Government has received a favourable proposal for postponing the sinking final, and has hired that there is some hope of a reduction of the interest. (Applanse.) I think we may fairly attribute this friendly attitude of the Government of India to the fact that one of its members, though he is now the watchful guardian of Finance, was formerly a Bengal officer, who cannot hold himself aloof from sympathy with the difficulties of Calcuta, (cheers) and that another is the distinguished officer who is about important discussion held a different view from that taken by the majority of the Calcutta mercantile community and by the Chamber of Commerce. But I feel sure that I am paving you no idle compliment when I express my belief that you would I give utterance to my genuine sentiments, (cheers) although they differ from yours, than that I should gloss them over, even out of deference to such an occasion as this. (Hear, hear.) I refer to the extension of the East Indian Railway system and to the desire which has been expressed that Calentia should not be ar the mercy of a single line in respect or its trains who with West India, but that a new railway capable of compering with the East India Railway should be constructed. My view on the other hand, has been that a single railway system is sufficient to carry all the traffic which now presents itself or is likely to present itself for the next twenty years, and that it is more advantageous to the trade of Calcutta, that capitals should be expended in developing the feeder communications and enlarging the rolling stock and the number of trucks on that system, than in constructing a rival with a greater mileage and inferior gradients. Mr. Henderson has referred to my past connection with the Public Works Department as giving me some right to form an opinion on the subject, and I confess that my experience in India and my study of the working of the principle of unlimited competi-tion in America have not been favourable to the proposed scheme. tion in America have not been (avoirable to the proposed scheme. America has taught us that competition generally ends in combination, and my belief is that if a rival line were constructed, we should soon see the two systems enter into an agreement to pull their earnings, and then the trade of Calcutta would have to pay frieghts sufficient to cover the working expenses and dividends of two railways, though it could all be carried by one. This, however, has been the only instance in which the views of the Bengal Government have been at variance with those of the Chamber of Commerce. On all other points we have been at one, and our united efforts have succeeded in carrying the connection of Calcutta with the East Coast and the Bengal Nagpore Railways---a measure which ought to do a great deal to redress the somewhat undue favour shown to the Bombay trade in former years. The Government has also supported the requirements of the Chamber of Commerce regarding the water communication with Eastern Bengal, and has earnestly pressed on the construction of feeder roads, feeder lines, and tramways. We have lately recommended to the Government of India a list of railway projects which cover a length of about 1,100 miles of broad gauge and 750 miles of narrow gauge line within this province, and projects extending to about 600 iniles have been formally or practically sanctioned. We have repeatedly expressed our conviction that with such a teeming population as that of Bengal, passenger traffic alone will secure a moderate dividend for any project which is judiciously selected and economically carried out, and we have hearthy supported the efforts of independent capitalists to construct small local railways and tramways round about Calcutta.

The principle of combination, rather than competition, which I have referred to in dealing with railway projects, is even more clearly applicable to the question of recruiting labour, whether for tea-gardens, for the colonies, or for coal mines, and this principle has been strongly advocated by this Government this principle has been strongly advocated by this Government in giving its adhesion to the request of the Chamber of Commerce for the appointment of the Commission to enquire into the labour question. The injury done to the great tea industry of Assam by the evils which attach to the present system of recruiting has been a cause for great anxiety ever since I learnt, as Chief Commissioner of that Province, to appreciate their gravity. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Efforts have been made to repress those evils by magisterial activity and by rules containing as much restriction as the law allows; and now the Government has indicated what we believe to be the only radical cure for the misdeeds which have made service on the Assam tea garden so undeservedly unpopular in Bengal. I can only express a hope that the clashing of oppying interests will not be found to be so unmanageable as to make it impossible to establish a voluntary organisation for the recruitment and supply of labour in which all employers shall combine and by which all demands shall be supplied.

The Census of Bengal taken in 1891 revealed the fact that the population had increased in ten years by five millions, or at the rate of half a million per annum; and we have reason to believe that that rate of increase still continues, or is but very slightly retarded, and instead of using Tennyson's lines "Every minute dies a man, every minute one is born," we find that in Bengal dies a man, every minute one is born," we find that in Bengal every minute seven persons die and eight are born. Barring the exchange difficulty, this growth of the population is the most serious danger which the Indian statesman has to face, (hear, hear) and putting aside the self-acting restrictions of thrift and prudence, tenders, and that another is the distinguished oncer who is about and priving some the series energies extentions of thrift and privateles, to succeed me, and who will, no doubt, feel the same desire to another the special tax on trade that I have felt. (Renewed cheers.)

Thrining now to the extension of the rulway system, I fear that I tread on somewhat delicate ground, inasmuch as I have in one is deeply interested in all schemes for fostering the development of commercial industries which take their rise from the accumulation of capital in Calcutta, in assisting to attract labour to the tea gardens, the coal mines, the colonies, the factories, and in resisting every malign influence which imposes unnecessary restricresisting every manign innuence which imposes unnecessary restrictions and creates difficulties under a guise of philanthropy. We had an instance of this last year when Mr. Playfair protested in the Supreme Council against an attempt to impose conditions of ship-builders which would tend to check the employment of Indian in support of his protest. (Applause.) A more serious attempt was made to throttle the new openings for the employment of labour in factories and in coal mines by imposing restrictions un-suitable to the climate and not required by the habits of the people. (Loud cheers.) In resisting these attempts the Chamber of merce has been warmly backed up by the Bengal Government, and material help has been received towards this end from the two ex-perts employed by Government.—Mr. Walsh, the Inspector of Factories, and Mr. Grundy, the Inspector of Mines, whose clear and judicious reports cannot but carry great weight with the authorities in England. Another mode in which this Government has co-operated to the same end is by encouraging the purchase of stores manufactured in this country in preference to buying and importing them from England (hear) and the result of this have been shown chiefly in the case of stationery, almost the whole of which ought to be made in India, and in the case of iron and steel required for Public Works, which, if sound materials capable of standing the prescribed tests are imported, can certainly be worked up as effectually here as at home. I trust, too, that the time is not far distant when steel rails and rought iron will be

What, then, is the effect which these new openings produce on the steady increase of the population? I do not wish to burden my speech with statistics, but I will indicate in a few words the conclusion to which our inquiries point.

The tea gardens of Assam absorb about 50,000 emigrants a year Darjeeling have increased their population at the rate of over 6,000 a year, so that the whole tea industry must draw off some 60,000 a The colonies take year from the annual growth of the population. about 10,000 a year, the factories of Bengal employ, according to our estimates, 85,000 people, and the annual increase in the numher during the last five years has been about 4,000. The coal mines during the same period have absorbed an increase of 10,000 hands a year and their proper development requires an annual addition of at least as great a number. Add to these the spread of employment on the indigo sactories, the railways, the Post and Telegraph Departments, and it is safe to assert that against the estimated annual growth of half a million of people in Bengal we can put a figure of about 100,000 as representing the number of persons (mostly adult males) who are every year drawn off the land and enabled to find a livelihood by the "diversity of occupations" which Calcutta trade and English capital creats. So mightily does the community represented here tonight co-operate with the Government in meeting the greatest economical danger to which the Indian empire is subject.

These remarks about the growth of population lead us to the great topic of sanitation and the constant effort to reduce the deathrate in which the Government is engaged. The period recently elapsed has seen the extension of the Calcutta water-supply to a large portion of the suburbs, and the project for bringing a new supply into Howrah is nearly completed, which will be a great benefit to several factories in which your capital is invested, and in which, as I am informed, Scotchmen are largely ed, and in which, as a sin morning, continued are largely employed; but the measures started neuly five years ago to pre-pare a scheme for the riparian municipalities from Barrackpore downwards have not yet taken a concrete form. As to the other branch of sanitation, drainage and sewerage public attention has lately been drawn to its defects in Calcutta, and an address from the Chamber of Commerce has materially strengthened the hands of Government in dealing with a municipality, the guiding body of which is more prone to talk than to action. (Laughter and We must all agree that where the expenditure of very Applause.) large sums is concerned it is right to be cantious and to consult the best authorities, but both the Government and the community are bound to see that caution is not carried too far, and that the fear of incurring expenditure does not outweigh the fear of increased

It is proper for me here to mention a matter in which Calcutta indirectly interested, but which has directly affected the prosperity of the Indian industry in which so much English capital invested, and the safety of the indigo pluters, several of whom are present here to-night. I refer to the troubles which arose out of the agitation to stop the killing of rows, and which led to much antagonism and to conflicts between Hintons and Mahomedans and to loss of lite in many parts of B har. This wave of feeling was a temporary one, and seems now to have passed away, but it has broken out twice during the last three years, and may break out again. It was a grave and alarming symptom while it lasted and the defeat of the aggressors was due primarily to the vigilance and resolution of the local officers and the good conduct of the police, largely assisted by the co-operation of the planters in the neighbourhood, and by the knowledge that that fine body of neighbourhood, and by the knowledge that that fine body of volunteers, the Behar Light Horse, could be relied on to restore quiet and to put down any disturbance that might arise. (Cheers.)

This leads me to refer to one detail of purely civil administration which is bound up with the preservation of peace throughout the eountry and the security of the great amount of English capital invested in Bengal---I mean the Police Department. No department of the Government service has been more bitterly attacked than the police, although all persons acquainted with the subject are agreed that the troubles I have just been speaking of in Behar they behaved uncommonly well, I have never admitted the justice of the attacks made on their efficiency, but at the same time everyone must agree that there is room for improvement --- that there are a certain number of black sheep and inefficient persons in the force. The Bengal Government has applied itself earnestly to the introduction of reforms in the police, and Mr. Henderson has already mentioned the principal improvements which have been effected. These reforms have been costly, but we believe that the These reforms have been costly, but we believe that the expenditure incurred will be well recouped to the Province by the improvement in the preservation of order and the punishment of

Perhaps the most important event which has taken place in the internal administration of the Province during the last five years has been the enlargement of the Legislative Council and the setting apart of some seats in it for the representation of certain important interests. The European community of Calcutta were not directly benefited by this change, because they had always sent up two members of the Council, and under the new regulations only one representative's seat was secured to the Chamber of Commerce; but it has been found practicable to confer another seat on a member representing the Trades Association and the advantage of his presence in our discussions has been so clearly felt that I conceive this practice is sure to be continued in future. In other respects, as regards the right of interpellation and the financial discussion on the Budget and, the extension of legislative authority even to the amendment of laws passed in the Supreme Council, the powers of the Bengal Council have greatly enlarged, and I think all those who have studied the debates must have felt that they were conducted in a clearer light and a broader atmosphere than besore. The legislation which concerned Calcutta and the European community has been the Fire Brigade Act, which reapportioned the cost of fire protection in a way which gave sensible relief to the jute industry; the Municipal Amendment Act, the main object of which was to remove inequalities of assessment and imperfection in account-keeping, and to give the Municipal Commissioners greater powers in regard to internal control; and the Electric Lighting Bill which is intended to confer the legal powers necessary to enable companies to be started for lighting different areas of this city. It is unfortunate that through a technical difficulty sanction has not yet been given to this Bill, for which I understand Calcutta is anxiously waiting, but we trust that that difficulty will soon be got over. (Hear, hear.) It is a pleasure to acknowledge the help that has (Hear, hear.) It is a pleasure to acknowledge the help that has been received from the representatives of the Chamber of Com-merce and the Trades Association in discussing these measures, and in all our proceedings the non-official members have shown both independence of spirit and critical sagacity. The turn which these discussions have often taken has no doubt added to the technical difficulties of legal drafting, but the Bengal Government desires to acknowledge the benefit which the enlarged constitution of the Council has worked as to the careful consideration of the principles on which legislation is based, the wisdom of compromise, and the reasonable difference to public opinion. At the same time it should not be supposed that the enlargement of the Council has led to greater activity in legislation. On the contrary, I am glad to announce that the Statue Book for the last five years, from 1891 to 1895 inclusive, contains 190 pages, against 357 contributed by legislative activity during the preceding five-year period. (Laughter and applause.)

There are many other subjects which might be dealt with did time permit, but I fear to trespass longer on your patience and will proceed at once to the last item on my list---the financial position of the province, and I need not go into much detail on this subject, because a resolution has lately been drawn up by Mr. Risley and published in the Gazette containing all requisite information, and Mr. Henderson has already referred to these figures with some fullness. It is enough to say that the province, which five years ago had a surplus of nearly five laklis above the minimum balance it is required to retain, is estimated to end the present year with a surplus of 21½ lakhs, and that estimate, I am in a position to say, is certain to be exceeded. (Cheers.) And while these figures are gratifying in themselves, it is still more gratifying to notice the processes by which they are realised. On the one hand, the income of the province has gone on steadily increasing, at the average rate of about eight lakes a year, and that not through the imposition of any new taxes or the discovery of any new sources of revenue; it has been the natural growth of the receipts under all heads, and mainly under the great departments of Stamps, Excise, and Railways, and is incontestably due to the increasing wealth and prosperity of the country. (Appliause.) On the other hand, the expenditure, governed by principles of rigid economy, such principles as were incultated by the Finance Committee in which my hon. friend Sir J. Westland collaborated with me, hardly increased at all, except under the heads of police and of the compensation allowance due to fall of exchange, till the present year, when, finding that funds were abundant, large outlay has been sanctioned on important Public Works. I venture to think that it is well to publish and emphasise such results as these in the face of the gloomy and passimistic criticism to which our financial position in India province of the Empire in which the assessment on the land is permanently fixed, so that that source of revenue cannot be materially augmented, and vet so wealthy and prosperous is it that what may be called the by-products of finance, the results of indirect taxation, have brought about a yearly growth of 8 lakhs in the Provincial income, as well as about 12 lakhs in the share paid to the imperial Government, and meanwhile the obligatory provincial expenditure has not increased by 4 lakhs a year, if we may assume that other provinces in which the Land Revenue is temporarily assessed and is constantly growing, feed the central treasury at anything like the same rate, the treasury is possessed of an assured classicity of revenue which places it in a high position of financial security which nothing can disturb except a catastrophic fall in exchange or the calamity of war. (Cheers.) No nation in the continent of Burope produces budgets nearly as favourable as this five-year series of Bengal budgets has been; not can they show results financially comparable to those of the Government of India. As long as this is the case, we may fairly ask the gentlemen who write so eligibly about the bankruptcy of India to devote their attention to discussing the bankruptcy of France or Italy or Germany or Austria.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I have come to the end of a long, and I fear a tedious, discourse, for which I have to ask the for-giveness of the audience. (Cheers.) Your cheers assure me that it has not been tedious, and I trust you will also consider that it has not been unduly egotistic. I have tried, under difficult circumnot been unduly egotistic. I have tried, under difficult circumstances, to keep that odius monosyllable out of my address, and to aubstitute the Bengal Government for it, and that for a very good reason. Gentlemen, the work done by the Bengal Government is not the work of one man; it is only in a limited degree that one man can claim to have given to it its bent and direction. It is the work of the Lieutenant-Governor, aided by his staff of secretaries, and supported by the whole hody of the service in the various departments, and no Lieutenant-Governor has ever been aided by an abler and more devoted staff of secretaries, or more loyally and efficiently supported by the different branches of the service than I have been.
(Cheers.) Nor is it the work of these officials alone, but of a great company of non-officials who voluntarily give their time, their ability, and their experience to the service of the State, and the value and effects of whose co-operation it has been my chief object to set forth and acknowledge to-night.

Five years ago, when you did me the honour to ask me to occupy the position I occupy now, and when I was on the eve of taking up my present office, as I am now on the eve of putting it down, I spoke of the encouragement which an assembly of this kind can give, representing as It does the most active and energetic of the induences which govern our connection with India, and I told you that there was no greater stimulus to a public man to do well than the belief of his countrymen that he will do well. (Cheers.) To that stimulous I owe much, and I have no doubt that you will extend and continue it to my successor, and to all who shall stand in the high and difficult post which it has been my honour to fill. If the remarks I have submitted to you to-night have any value it consists in showing how great is the variety and importance of the duties devolving on the Bengal Government, and how valuable is the support which it receives from the powerful European community in Calcutta and in the interior of the Pro-

And there is another side to our connection with Calentta and Bengal, of which, it I could possibly be forgetful of it, Mr. Henderson's closing remarks, and the presence of this large number of ladies assembled to hear the speeches of to-night would remind me--I mean the social side. However engrossing official life may be, it is not, I am thankful to say, altogether absorbing; it still leaves leisure for the innumerable gracious acts of kindness and courtesy, the giving and receiving of which constitute the happiness of private life. In this sphere in which my wife have reigned supreme (found cheers) we have good reason to know and gratefully to remember what your opinion is of the way in which she has played her part. Our recollection of this portion of our life will be one long series of lasting friendships and pleasant acquaintanceships made, of unexpected kindnesses received of sympathy in troubles and difficulties, of favourable construction put on our intentions and of graticude for proffered help and hospitality far exceeding our deserts. Believe me, ladies and gentlemen, it is no slight thing to be able to say, at the end of so long a connection as ours has been with this place, that there has been nothing for us to regret, and nothing to cast a shadow over the pleasant recollections we shall always retain of Calcutta Society, (Cheers.)

And now before I sit down I have a pleasant duty to perform in proposing the health of the Chairman, the Hon. Mr. Playfair, who has so ably and successfully presided over this meeting tonight, and has contributed a speech to which we have all listened with interest, and which will be long remembered by the Scotchmen of Calcutta. I have known him for several years as a colleague in the Bengal and Supreme Council Chambers, and we have shared in many important discussions and hot debates, and whether we have been on the same or on opposite sides I have learnt to feel great respect for his acuteness, his experience and his courtesy. (Applause.) His position as Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce shows what the commercial world think of him, and I have endeavoured in the earlier part of my speech to explain how highly Bengal Government values the opinion and advice of Chamber. We have seen to night how well he fills the chair at a meeting of his brother Scots, and in all these capacities I ask you to drink his health. (Cheers.)

THE DOG, THE MAN, AND THE MEAT.

THE DUG, THE MAN, AND THE MEAT.

A FRIEND of mine and I were walking together the other day; a dog dished pist us after something he aim on the pavement. It was a big piece of meat. He pounced on it and swalkinged it in two seconds. My companion looked at the dog with envious admiration. "My humble friend," he said, "I'll give you £5,000 for your appetite and your digestion. you are not afraid to eat; I am," But the dog knew what happiness is made of. He declined the offer and trutted away. It is astemishing how many different people me this expression. "I am' or "I was "afraid to eat. As the writer pens these lines five letters lie on the lable before hun, every one of them containing it. Yet the persons who wrote the letters are not known in one another. There was, therefore, no agreement among them. Why should there be, even if they were acquainted?

There was, therefore, no agreement among them. Why should there be, even if they were acquamted?

No, there is moding in it to wonder at. They went through the same experience, and express it in the most natural way, that's all. But what does it mean? An people suspections of possible fload? No, no; that is not so. The food is not possible before it is eaten,

No, no; that is not so. The food is not poisoued before it is eaten, but afterwards. An example will show what really occurs, and why so many are afiand to eat.

We quote from one of the letters: "One might, early in 1892," says the writer, "I was serzed with dieadful pains in the pit of the stainach, and a choking sensation in the libroat. I feated I was going to die, My wife called in a neighbour. They applied hat flainnels and impentiue, but I got no relief. Then a doctor came and gave me medicine. He said he never say anyone's tongue in such a condition. It was of tine, but I got no relief. Then a doctor come and gave me medicine. He said he never saw anyone's tongue in such a condition. It was of a yellow colour, and covered with a slimy phlegm, so thick I could have scraped it with a kinfe. I had a foul, buter taste in the mouth, and my eyes were so dull I could scarcely see. I had a heavy-pain in the sule, and fell so dejected and miserable I duly' know what in do with miself. What little foud I took gave me so much p in I was a finit to The doctor put me on starvation dier, and injected morphine to Getting no real benefit from the first doctor I saw another, who said Grining no real bencht from the first dot for I saw another, who said I had ealar gement of the liver. He'give me medicines, but I got no better In August I went to Exmouth to see what my native air would do for me, but came back worse than ever. I had lost over three sinne in weight, and being too weak to move about I used to be on the couch most of the time. I never expected to get well, and didn't care much what became of me.

"One day in October my wife said, "It appears the doctors can do nothing for you, so I am going to doctor you myech! She went to the Southern Drug Socies, in Camberwell Raud, and got a boile of Mother Southern Drug Sones, in Comberwell Road, and got a house of Mother Seigel's Curative Sying. After taking this medicine for a few days the gain in my stomach left me, my appetite improved, ond I gained some strength. Soon afterwards I was back at my work. The people in the office, seeing how well I looked, asked what had cared me, and I answered Mother Seigel's Sying. I shall be glad to reply to any inquiries about my case. (Signed) Charles Harris, 74, Beresford Street, Camber well, London, December 1st, 1892."

Mr. Harris' statement goes straight to the point. Why was he afraid to eat? Because his food gave him pain without giving him strength. This was dead wrong. It was exactly the reverse of what it should have been. When a man is the proper form he gets vigour and power from his meals, and eats them with enjoyment and relish. If he doesn't there is something the matter with him. What is it?

Now let your thoughts expand a bit, so as to take in a broad princidoesn't there is something the matter with him. What is it?

Now let your thoughts expand a bit, so as to take in a broad principle. One nau's ment is another man's poison, they say. That's so, but it's only half the truth. Any man's ment is another man's poison, they say. That's so, but it's only half the truth. Any man's ment is any man's foison, under certain conditions. If grain never got any further than the mill hopper we should never have bread, and if bread for other food) never got further than the stomach we should never have strength. See? Well, when the stomach is topic, inflamed, and "ON STRIKE," what happens? Why, your food lies in it and ruts. The fermentations produces pursons which get into the blood and kicks up the worst sort of mischef all over the body. This is indigestion and dyspepsia, though the doctors call each and every trick of it by a separate name. Yet they don't cure it which is the main thing after all.

But Mother Seigel's Curative Syrap does, as Mr. Harris says, and as thousand of other say.

OPINION ON THE BOOK.

1895.
Dr. Maokerjee was a famous letter-writer, and there is a breezy freshiess and originality about his correspondence which make it very interesting reading—Sir Alfred W. Coff, RCIF, Director of Public Instruction, Bengal.

KC1F., Director of Public Instruction, Bengal. 26th September, 1895.
It is not that and the pressure of harassing official duties an English Civilian can find either time or opportunity to pay so graceful a tribute to the memory of a native personality as F. H. Skrine has done in his biography of the late Di. Sambhu Chunder Muokeijee, the well-known Bengal journalist (Calcutta Thacker, Spink and Co.); nor are there in my who are more worthy of being thus homized than the late Editor of Rest and Rayyet.

We may at any rate cordially agree with Mr. Skrine that the study of Mookeijee's life, with all its lights, and shadows, is pregnant with lessons for those who desire to know the real ludia.

lessons for those who desire to know the real India.

No weekly paper, Mr. Skrine tells us, not even the Hindoo Patriot, in its palinisest days under Kristodas Pal, enjoyed a degree of influence in any way approaching that which was smoutationed by Reis and Raypet.

A man of large heart and great qualities, his death from purenionia in the early spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian poinolism, and it was an admit ble idea on Mr. Skrine's not to put his Lafe and Letters more record.—The Times of India, (Brookay 5) attender 30, 1895.

It is nely in it the life of an Indian point if stocomes worthy of publication, it is more rurely still the such the course to be written by an Anglo Indian and a member of the Indian Civil Service. But, it has come to pass that in the land of the Beng in Biblishe life of at least one min among Indian, the life of at least one min among Indian. But it is the land of the Beng in Biblish palmatic Stindard, (Middas). September 33, 1895.

The late Editor of Reis and Ravret wis The life Edition of Net and Laborer was a profound student analy an accomplished writer, who has left his mirk on Indian journalism. In that he has found a Civilian like Mr. Skine to record the story of his life he is more fortunate than the great Kristodis Palhimself - The Tribune, (Labore) October 2, himself -The Tribune, (Linure) October 2, 1895.

For much of the briggraphical matter this issues so freely from the piess an applying the Editor of Reit and Rayrel, appeared, an explanation would have been looked for A min of his rem triable personality, who was easily first among native Indian poundlists, and in many respects occupied a higher plane than different point of view from thems, could not be suffered to sink into oblivious without some attempt to perpetuate his memory by the usual expedient of a "life." The difficulties common o all biographers have in this case been in-creased by special circumstances, int the least of which is that the author belongs to a differof which is that the author belongs to a differ-ent race from the subject. It is true that among Englishmen there were many admirers of the learned Dictor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreigners understand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assimilation of English modes of thought and expression, of M. Mooker-jee remained to the list a Brahman of the Brahman accountage of the best of his jee remained to the less a Brahman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that wins nothing but respect and approval. In consequence of this, his ideal brographer would have been one of his own disciples, with the same inherited sympathies, and trained like him in Western learning. If Bengal had produced such another man as Dr. Mookeijee, it was he who should have written his life.

the biography is warmly appreciative without being needlessly landatory; it gives on the whole a complete picture of the main; and in the book there is not a dull page.

A few of the letters indressed to Dr. Mookerjee are if such minor importance that they might have been omitted with advantage, but not a word of his own letters could have been spared. To say that he writes idomatic English is to say what is short of the truth. His diction is easy and correct, clear and straight-forward, without Ociental luxuriance or striving after effect. Perhaps he is never so char ning as when he is laying down the laws of literary form to young aspirants to fame. The letter after effect. Perhaps he is never so charming as when he is laying down the laws of literary form to-groung aspirants to faine. The letter on pige 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticista; it is delicate plani-speaking, and he accomplishes the difficult feat of telling a would-be poet that his productions are not in the smallest degree poetry, without one may conclude, either offending the youth or repressing his ardour.

For much inter that is well worth reading we must refer realers to the volume itself. Intrinsically 4t is a pook worth buying and reading.—The Pioncer, (Allahabad) Oct. 5, 1895.
The career of "An Indian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly interesting.
Monkerjee's letters are marvels of pure diction which is heightened by his nervous style.
The life has been told by Mr. Skrine in a very pleasant manner and which should make it popular not only with Bengalis but with all those work leaves nothing to be desired either in the way of completeness, impartiality, or lifelike portrayal of character.

Mr. Skrine deals with his interesting subject with the unfailing instinct of the bingrapher.

Every side of Dr. Mookerjee's complex character is treated with sympathy tempered by discrimination.

Mr. Skring's, parrative certainly impresses one with the individuality of a remarkable man.

Miokeijee's own letters show that he had not only acquired a command of clear and flexible English but that he had also assimilated that stordy independence of thought and character which is supposed to be a peculiar possession of natives of Great Billian, His reading and the stores of his general in-formation appear to have been, considering his opportunities, little less than marvellous, the opportunities, little less than marvellous, then of the first to express his condolence with the family of the deceased writer was the present Vicercy, Lord Elgin. Mookerjee appears to have won the affection not only of the digottaness with whom he came in contact, the organizates with whom he came in contact, but ilso of those in low estate.

The impression left upon the mind upon laying down the book is that of a good and able man whose career has been graphically portrayed,—The Englishman, (Calcutta) October 1. The Englishman, (Calcutta)

The career of an eminent Bengali editor, who died in 1894, throws a curious light upon the race elements and hereditary influences which affect the criticisms of Indian journal-which the Criticisms of Indian Jodinatists on British rule.

The "Life and Letters of Dr. S. C. Monkerjee," a book just educed by a distinguished civilian in Calcutta, takes us behind the scenes of Indian journalism.

It is a narrative, written with insight and a Calcutta.

complete mastery of the facts, of how a clever youth gradually grew into one of the ablest leader-writers in Bengal, and still more gradu-ally matured into one of the fairest-minded citiors that western education in India has yet produced. If the training and experience which develop the journalist in England are sometimes varied, they seem in India to have an even wider range,

But the object of this notice is to show h a great Bengali journalist is made; space for-bids us to enter upon his actual performances. They will be found set forth at sufficient length, and with much felicity of expression, in Mr. Skrine's admirable monograph. It is characteristic of the noble service to which Mr. Skrine belongs, that such a book should have issued from its ranks. Dr. Mookerjee was no optimist. One of his brilliant speeches contained the following sentence:—" India has neither the soil nor the elasticity enjoyed by young and vigorous communities, but pre-sent the arid rocks and deserts of an effect sent the arid rocks and deserts of an effete civilization, hardly surred to a semblance of life by a foreign occupation dozing over its easily-gained advantages." This was true of the pre-Mutiny India of 1831. If it is no longer true of the Queen's India of 1895, we owe it in no small measure to Indian journalists like Dr. Mookerjee who have laboured, and ne misrepresentation, to quicken the imblance of life " into a living reality.—The Times, (London) October 14, 1895.

WHOLE NO. 204.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SERPENT OF VERNAG. A KASHMIR LEGEND.

In the reign of Jan Mahamed, The mighty and wise Wuzeer, There dwelt a noble at Archi-Bul, A noble and also a Pir.

Of course he had a daughter, Of course she was lovely and young, But the test of my lay is not of course, As you'll say when you've heard it sung.

This nobleman's daughter she fell in love, As noblemen's daughters will do ; The fortunate man had a handsome face, And a handsome fortune too.

The son of a merchant of substance. He certainly savored of trade; But nubles don't always ask questions How son-in-law's maney was made.

Of course "blue blood" is a great fact, But it must occasionally fail; But-and now, perhaps, like a monkey-I'd better run after my tale.

Well, the nobleman's daughter was hoppy, And so was the young milhonaire; And the terrible nonsense they chattered Was really a caution-I'll swear.

One day the young lady reflected-My lover is rich and all that; But I hope he's a thorough " bahadur," I won't wed a coward that's flat.

The next time her lover came seeking For sweet conversation and tea, The princess was grave and dejected; He wondered what 'ere it could be.

Quoth the lady, " Dear Ahmed, I've heard Of a horrible snake at Vernag, And the animal's very existence Is on your known prowess a 'dag.'

" Now go 'like a goodie' and kill him; Be worshipped by great and by small, While your loving and faithful Azizee Will worship you nice than all !"

Young Ahmed he twitled his mustachios ; He didn't quite fancy the game, But he glanced at his peerless Azizee, And soon became " perfectly tame,"

"My fairest!" he answered with fervour, " My bulbul, my pishpash, and butter ! I'll slay that most, ah ! horrible serpent, Or else I'll come back on a shuiter.'

"Oh, you darling !" quath lovely Azizee, " Now, the sooner you do it the better; Pack your things, and be off to Vernag; When you get there, why, send me a letter."

Young Ahmed be twirled his mustachios, Kissed his love, took his sward, and said, " How ! " Good-bye, my most peerless of maids, and Just mention my trip to Papa."

Our hero soon got to Vernag, And sought out the hannt of the snake ; How he longed, as the spot he drew near, That his sword he could honestly break !

Now, nigh to the home of the serpent There dwelt a recluse of renown, Of whose wisdom and knowledge young Ahmed Had frequently heard in the town.

The Pir as our lover diew nearer, Stepped out from his hole in the rock, And addressed him in linguage familiar, "How goes it, my handsome young cock?

"If you are came after the serpent, I'll mention, by way of olvice, That I'd strongly advise you to drop it? You'll find he is 'dear a the price.

"Already eight gallant young fellows This serpent has quiet's 'chawed ;' They were all of them thou high ' bahadurs,' And all very neat with it " . word,

" If you'll take the advice of a party Who knows the old seeps at right well, You'll just let that serpent slone, And thereby will give non a 'sell."

"He's watching you un! rihe water, He's thinking how nice you will taste In fact, he is ready for bainte, And wishes you'd only make haste.

"I knew what you came for at once, and, Excuse me, I think you're a fool; But all you young fellows in love are Exempt from each midmaty rule.

"Just go back, and if Mistress Az zee Persists in her conduct inhuman, Why, take the advice of a friend, And look out for another young woman !

Young Ahmed he twirled his mustachios, Drew his sword, and gave vent to a " haw," When the snake, n'er the top of the waters, Revealed his most terrible maw.

" Just take my advice !" cried the Pir. Quoth Ahmed, "I certainly mean to ; But see what a fool I shall look, And what an expense I have been to !"

Quath the Pir,-" These eight foolish young men Who tackled the snake in the water, Will ne'er have a change, I'll be bound. Of espousing a noblem m's daughter :

" You have-Now do as I tell you, Go back, and just out with the truth : If she makes any fuss she's a fool, And you are a sensible youth,"

Young Ahmed he sheathed his tulwar. And returned to fair Islamabail, He told his princess "all about it." And what an escape he had had.

Azizee just ponted a little, . And vowed that his failure would fret her, Then whispered, "I think you were right, And the snoter we're married the better ! -Indian Society.

A MERRY Christmas to all our Christian readers ! According to an Angla-Indian.

Christmas at Home is one unique-While out in India or Mozimbique, Or other ungadly diggings you seek, It is little better than murder !

Whatever the case in other diggings, it is different in India. The severity of climate is a great har to the true enjoyment of the festive season even " at Hone." Here, besides a clement weather obviating the necessity of log fire, you have the speciacle and the satisfaction of other nationalities contributing to and taking part in the merriment You must not blame the country if you are not prepared for more than

Would all classes took part and peace prevailed I The delegates have been appointed and they are preparing to start. Great efforts have been made to have Bengal adequately represented specially as a Bengah will preside. THE new rule in Bengal is thus announced in an Extraordinary issue of the Calcutta Gazette:-

"The 17th December 1895.—The Honourable Sir Alexander Mickenzie, K.C.S.I, of the Indian Civil Service, having been appointed by this Excellency the Governor-General of India, with the approbation of Her Majesty the Queence upress of India, to be Lieutenant-Governor of the Bengai Division of the Piesidency of Fort William, has this day (afternoon) assumed charge of the Office under the usual

An unusually beautiful diamond of 655 carats has been found in the Lagersfontein more in the Orange Free State.

THE Postal insurance originally sanctioned for the Postal and Telegragh Departments, has been extended to all Government servants in subordinate positions.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has authorised, noder section 54 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act, which, with certain other portious of the Act, has been extended to Orissa by Government Natification, dated toth September, 1891, that from the 1st January, 1896, the payment of rem by means of postal money-order shall be allowed in the district of Puri.

Ar the Alipur Cominal Sessions, Rughu Nundan Singh, an apcountry man, charged with draving, over a monetary dispute, stabled a man to seath, has been sentenced to sen years' imprisonment. Identification by finger primis has also been sanctioned by the Modras Government. It is a dirty system at hest and we are not sine that it is the safest. The exception allowed by the Bengal Government must ere long be made more general to make the rule acceptable, if at all. By the bye, is it left to Government to introduce any form of identification?

It is gazetted that the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to prescribe that a recommendation for a nomination to one sen in his Connect for making Laws and Regulations shall be made to bim by the moncipalities of Cuttack, Kenderpara, Balasore and Puri in the Oussa Division and those of Hazaribagh, Chatra, Rinchi and Purulia in the Chota Nagpar Division. In this connection we have received the following telegram from Balasore:

A proposal to give the municipality's vote to Rije Bukunthanath. Dey in case Bahn Madhisudan Das withdraws his candidature, was opposed and ultimately Raja Baikunthanath has already sat as a member under the old momination system. He seems to be at a discount at the present moment. Bahon Hurrybullub Biss, Government Pleader, Cuttack, as a Government servant, is, we believe, disqualified, or else he would have been a good representative of Orissa, where he has hunself hved long and prospered and where other members of his family have been well-known. LORD Dalhousie's letters on the first Burmese war are about to see the tight through the enterprise of Mr. George W. Mr. Forrest has published extracts from these letters in the Athenaum.

ANOTHER discovery of the missing link! This time not in Europe but in Asia. Dr. Eugene Buthors on Darwins Darwin. As the fortunate finder, he is making much in Great Bittain of the find. Under orders of the Dutch Indian Government he was conducting explorations in Java when 3 or 4 years ago he came upon some fosuit vertebrate fama at Trimil, on the Southern slope of a range of hills, the Kenvengs. These remains found in beds of cemented volcame tuffi, consisting of clay, sand and lappilistone of fluviatile origin, he identifies as those of a large animal in form seemingly internactiate between the anthropoid apes and min. They are the upper portion of a skull, a femurant two in three molar teeth. Coming from phocene strata, they have been named "Pithecanthropus erectus." The bones have been examined by others. Sir W. H. Flower finds it difficult from the few fragments to say what they really are, but is of opinion that they showed more tendencies to the man side than any other remains he had ever seen.

OUR Manghyr carrespondent writes under date J imalpore, Dec. 15:

This station was full of hustle for a fortnight from the 2nd to the 14th instant, owing to the volunteer camp of exercise. There were exercises if soits, puades, mock-fights, &c. Volunteers came from different stations, on the railway line and were housed in tents putched on the maidan in military array. The display, however, had no effect on thieves and bargiars who were more abuquitous than ever.

in the native portion of the town, named Noyagong, smallpox rages futionally. It threatens to be epidemic. The local municipality, on the recommendation of the E I. Railway Company's medical officer, has placed guards on officered houses to prevent communeation with the outside public. The object evidently is to airest the march of the disease by infection. The idea may be good, but the question is, How are the patients to be treated and cared for? If all connouncation with the outer world be cut off, how are the immates of the houses to live? Their perpetual confinement exposes them to more than the usual risks of attack. The intelligent natives or Baboos attached to several offices, as a tule, give intimation to the Ductor and their office-masters of an ontbreak of the disease in their quarters and are not permitted to attend office during its continuance. The illiterate Behavis do not show the least auxiety. They save themselves all trouble by allowing the disease to run its natural course, and apprehend no danger from contagion. The strict municipal regulation is calculated to do more harm than good. For one thing, all the cases are not reported.

I am sorty to write that Babu Dheeraj Karan, M. A., B. L., Government Plender, Monghyr, is dead. He was ailing for some time from diabetes.

BEFORE the new Eistern Question in Europe is settled, a war cloud appears in the serene horizon of the New World. President Cleveland has sent a Message to Congress in which he states that, in view of Great Britain's refusal to accept arbitration in the Venezuela frantier question, he recommends Congress to appoint a Commission to determine the time frontier; and it will be the duty of America to resist by every means in her power any attempt on the put of Great Britain to take territory which that Commission may adjudge to Venezuela. President Cleveland concludes by saying that he keenly realizes the gravity of the possible consequences of this proposal. The President prefixes this warlike utterance by a Libraried reminition of Lind Salisbucy's confection that America is giving a new and strange extension to the Monroe doctrine, which is unknown in international law. Anylow, it is not applicable to the pending question. The Messige was most beartily applauded by the Members of Congress. The London journ ds are no comous in rejecting the claims set forth in President Cleveland's message as preposterous, although they recognize that they are a party electoral move. President Cleveland, they add, has raised a grave international question. The American papers approve of the President's message, but the New York World calls it a grave blunder, and says that it is absurd to contend that Great Britain is not an American Power. It condemos the unisclueyous extension of the Monroe doctrine to a paltry boundary dispute in South America, which would be likely to provide endless complications in Europe; and advises the exercise of prudence in dealing with the question. The Canadian press applauds Lord Salisbury's action, and urges the Canadian Government to look to the defences of the fromter. The French papers refuse emphatically to recognize President Cleveland's assertion regarding the Mouroe doctrine. The Continental press is mostly astounded at the demands

A meeting of the New York Chamber of Commerce has been summoned to protest against President Cleveland's action.

On the 19th, on a motion brought forward by Senator Morgan, supported by Senator Sherman, it was decided to refer the Venezuelan Commission Bill, which had been passed by the House of Representatives, to the Foreign Committee. Both speakers supported President Cleveland's policy, but deprecated any hasty action in the matter.

The arrival last week of Lord Elgin was private and there was no guard of honour. Only the Commissioner of Police and the Chairman of the Corporation met him at the Ghat, the attendance of other officials, either there or at Government House, being dispensed with. A salute was fired and a detachment of the Body-guard escorted the Viceroy, through the Strand Road and Esplanade Row, into Government House by the north-west entrance.

Since then he has been besieged with private interviews and applications for the same propose, and been otherwise, busy with ceremonial functions. List Strurday he presided at a friewell Dinner at Goveroment House to Sir Charles and Lidy Elliott, On Monday, the 16th, he was present at Sir Charles Ellinti's farewell Garden Party at Belvedere. The same night he stood the ordeal of the Levée. Next day be unveiled the murble statue of Sir Sienart Colvin Bayley near the south of the Treasury Buildings. The Drawing Room of Lady Elgin came off on the 19th,

THE attendance at the Levée was less by about 300 than in the preceding year. Last year the number was 1,269. This time a fell to 1,009 as will be found from our following analysis of the List published in the mining papers. The hour is ansmited to Asiatics. The inevitable exposure on a cold December und-night on the grand stair-case while wanning for the garry, not to speak of the ups and downs and the birricades to prevent the inch, keeps away many from the loyal bow. Are better arrangements not possible? Formerly, as now in Bombay, the Levée in Calciura would be held in the afternoon. That was not convenient to Europeans. But the change is positively disagreeable to the natives. A return to the afternoon would also be acceptable to the general public who might enjoy from a distince the ceremony as a show.

An extraordinary number of the "Trichmopoly Destrict Gizettee" was issued as early as the 1st of November announcing the visit to. Trichmopoly of the Vicercy. THE ADMINISTRATION OF SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT.

We come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him. Our resolve is sincerer than Mark Antony's, for it is not possible for us to steal the hearts of the citizens by propounding Cæsar's secret will and aunouncing the throwing open of pleasure-grounds to the public or other legacies of any kind. Marcus Square, even if it were Cæsar's, is not a thing of beauty yet; fætid with the smell of municipal sweepings lightly covered over with loose earth and rubbish, it is still unplanted. Nor will all sections of the public be able to recreate themselves on it as on a common ground. We have it not in our power to also notify the gift of even seventy-five depreciated Rupees to every citizen. We shall, therefore, speak right on, without exaggerating anything or glossing over any incident.

There can be no doubt that Sir Charles Elliott was a vigorous ruler. He is a man of strong individuality. Trained first in the North-West and subsequently reaping his laurels in a large Non-Regulation Province, when he came to Bengal, he found himself in altogether a different sphere. We omit, of course, his short experiences as a Member of the Supreme Council, which exerted little influence on the formation of his character. The fact can hardly be gainsaid that with his strong individuality of character he was as little suited to Bengal as Bengal with its well-trained district administrators and its superior organisation was little suited to him. The reign of law is scarcely adapted to the exhibition of vigorous individualism. Vigour of character in such a Province soon developes into vigour beyond the law. That, therefore, which was the strong point of Sir Charles Elliott's character operated as a positive disqualification for the rule of a Province like Bengal. He could see no fault in a Beatson Bell administering a few blows to a Zemindar's agent who had failed to keep ready a glass of milk or a few eggs for which it is ten to one the man would not have been paid. Mr. Phillips a large onical that required a tightening of the reins. A Riden too, shooting at the doors and windows of a native subject of the crown for tealfying him into submission and subsequently arresting him with his own hands and dragging him for a long distance in order to make him over to the authorities for prosecution and punishment, seemed to the late ruler of Bengal as no way deserving of even a mild censure. The very vigour of Sir Charles Elliott led him to examine the judicial decision in the case of the Shambazar rioters and administer, in so far as it lay with him, a rebuke to the Judge for doing only his duty. His well-known words in another case, to the effect that "somebody should be ponished" when he saw the prosecution fail against the men hanled up on suspicion, simply illustrated his impatience of the Law and its suber procedure. A crime had been perpetrated. The Police, unable to spot the real criminals, had made indiscriminate arrests. Judge and jury let the accused off. The Lieutenaut-Governor breame dissatisfied. His dissatisfaction was not due to the fact of an undetected crime; but it was qwing to somebody not having been punished by the Judges. A conviction, right or wrong it mattered little, was wanted. The very head of the Province betrayed an anxiety that characterises a Head Constable when he fails to send up anybody upon a crime happening.

The share which Sir Charles Elliott had in the Jury business cannot be held to have redounded to his honour. Failing to understand the very object for which the jury exists and is prized by the people, he looked upon it as a machinery for the repression of crime. Without at all acquainting himself with the opinions of men as well entitled to speak on the question as he, without, in fact, knowing that only a few years ago the Government of India had collected a large body of opinion advising extension of the jury trial, he surprised Bengal one fine morning by a notification in the Gazette, withdrawing many offences from the cognisance of the jury. This sort of government by surprises is suited to only a ruler of despotic rendencies. Government is a more serious business than the creation of surprises by the bursting of bomb bells and feats of legendemain, Supposing Sit Charles Elliott was really moved by a few instances of failure on the part of native juries to convict, and that his scheme of readjusting the offences to able by juries arose out of his desire to see injective checked at its source, what answer can he apologists give to his indifference to regulate the trials of British subjects who, it is notorious, are seldom convicted by juries composed of their own countrymen? The fulures of native juries to conv + are few and far between, while European juries (all systematically to do their daty. Sir Charles would have acted justly by endeavouring to mitigate this scandal instead of taking up, in pure ignorance of facts, the question of native juries and the objuces triable by them. It is impossible to suppose that an observer so acute as the late Lieutenant-Governor had not marked the scandalous failures of justice in the trials of European offenders. His reluctance, however, to take up the question must be ascribed to motives. that would not bear examination. We have no wish, however, to slay the thrice-slain. The obalso of Mymensing fame, violating the law for humiliating a local Zemindar held in respect by a large tenantry and by the country besides, upon the opinions of others as on the opinions of its autocratic head for the time being.

The attitude of Sir Charles Elliott towards the The Official was extremely hostile. Secrets Act had originally been passed in England. It had stood the test of Radical criticism. Its professed object is to guard information regarding fortifications and plans and particulars regarding the army and its movements from the knowledge of the enemy. To apply the provisions of that Act against a newspaper editor for anticipating in his columns the announcement of the transfer of an official or a new appointment, is the height of absurdity. Lord Lansdowne was scarcely justified in making the observations he did from his place in Council on the occasion of adopting the English Statute for India. Sir Charles Elliott, on more than one occasion, sought to put newspaper editors into trouble by threatening them with prosecutions under the Official Secrets Act for no more heinous offence than the announcement of a transfer or an appointment before the official notification in the Gazette. For sometime he constituted himself a Guardian-General of the decency and morals of the native press of Bengal. If an expression was detected that offended him for its strength, forthwith a communique was sure to be issued calling for an explanation. The rider was seldom omitted that unless the explanation was satisfactory, the name of the paper would be removed from the Belvedere list. Sir Charles was a religious man and his relations with the Christian Missionaries were intimate. His ears and nostrils were very delicate. He detected lurking obscenity in items of medical or scientific news which, after replies and rejoinders, were found, according to his own fulwas to be only "disgusting." Even here it was his vigorous individualism that operated frequently to hoist him on his own petards. He would rule not only men, but their very expressions of anger and sorrow as well.

Su Charles' treatment of dismissed public servants showed little regard for justice. Under no other ruler have so many appeals from public servants removed by subordinate heads of departments and sections been thrown out. If a comparative statement be drawn up of the number of appeals thrown out by successive Lieutenant-Governors, Sir Charles Elliott will gain an unenviable distinction. In this respect, however, it is probably his Chief Secretary that was more to blame than he. Utterly destitute of any administrative genius, without any knowledge of the law, and thoroughly unable to grasp the details! of any subject, his Chief Secretary was allowed to do an amount of mischief that is startling. "Declines to interfere" has been his stereotyped answer to appeals against sentences however. mijust or muc isonable. The book is not unworthy of Mr. R. C. law in the matter of depriving public servants of Dutt. The preliminary chapters show both thought bread or of injuring private citizens in respect of and research. The treatment also has been syste their character. So John, again, never allowed in-tuitic. The language is easy and chaste. Sentences, ferior clerks of his office to decide grave issues of however, may be detected here and there that law. Sir Charles Elhoit's Secretariat, however, had want compactness and that are rather colloquial little compunctions of conscience in rejecting the This perhaps is due to haste. government is a serious business depending as much vigour beyond the law would be furnished by his action in the matter of Abalakanta Sen's keys About a hundred books, many of them exceedingly useful, judging by their sale, were suppressed by an executive order. Abalakanta had written some keys in elucidation of a few Bengali primers for little children. In explaining the morals of a few of the stories the writer had indulged in some foolish observations on the character of British rule. The first editions, in which those observations occurred, had long been out of print. Not a copy could be obtained in the market. In the later editions the objectionable passages had been expunged. For all that, full seven years after the date of publication, the Government of Sir Charles Elliott resolved to take action. The Crown lawyers were consulted. They refused to take the responsibility of advising a criminal prosecution. Accordingly, an executive ukase was issued directing that any student found with a copy of the objectionable publications would, after the first warning, be punished with academic death. The keys were intended for only little children. But Sir Charles was in no mood for distinguishing as to who can or who cannot be guilty of offences. He had no time to study the Penal Code. Not only was a new offence, viz., key-carrying, created, but a punishment, the heaviest that can be inflicted on a student, was devised for those incapable of committing any offence, under the law. The ostensible reason was the suppression of seditions literature. But the beauty of the situation was that there was no objectionable book in actual circulation that demanded suppression. Except half a dozen copies on the shelves of the Bengal Government Library not a copy could anywhere be found. The educational authorities used the order about only a couple of keys for suppressing all the publications of the poor author, including even mathematical and historical treatises and other perfectly inoffensive books. The latitude given to the Secretariat ukase was brought to the late Lieutenant-Governor's notice, but he made no sign to rectify the mistake.

In his St. Andrew's dinner speech, Sir Charles took great credit to himself for his economy. His economy, however, was so rigid that it has scriously interfered with efficiency. By reducing the salaries in the Secretariat, the way has been paved, we lear, for demoralisation. Men in responsible structions should be placed above temptation. First consideration never entered Sir Charles Elliott's head, Really, if he had a little less individualism and more respect for the opinions of others, he would have made a good provincial heutenant.

LITERATURE OF BENGAL.

EVERY one interested in the literature of Bengal most had with pleasure the appearance of a book which huntary independence by subordinate tyranny.

Another noted instance of Sir Charles Elliott's The words, again, have been given wrongly. It is not "puking and mewling in its mother's arms" but contestably. Bharata's hopes were not fulfilled. The mewling and puking in the nurse's arms." The professional reciters turned their back upon him. It transposition of mewling and puking, the substi-tution of 'its' for 'the' and of 'mother's' for 'nurse's' are not the trifles some take them to be. To misquote is an ugly and slovenly habit destructive of the very integrity of the literary character. These, however, are minor faults.

Mr. R. C. Dutt corrects the popular error about Bidyapati. The latter was a native of Behar and wrote or sung not in Bengali but in Hindi. The language of Bengali poetry has undergone little modification. Chandidas drew his inspiration from Bidyapati, Both belonged to the fourteenth century and were contemporaries. The difference between their language is very great. It is impossible to suppose that the language of Bidyapati is the Bengali of the fourteenth century. Mr. Dutt is certainly right in taking Chandidas as the true father of Bengali poetry.

While agreeing with much that Mr. Dutt has said on the history of the Bengali language and alphabet and endorsing, in the main, his estimates of particular authors, we cannot but say that as a history of Bengali literature, there are serious omissions in the book. The following sentences dispose of the great work of Ghauaram. "The eighteenth century produced many other poets in Bengal, and Ghanaram's voluminous work, written early in the century, has recently been published. But Ghanaram and other poets like him are little known to the reading public of Bengal. The songs of Ram Prosad and the poetry of Bharat Chandra are the greatest literary products of this century." This is just the kind of error that we expected in the book when we took it up. The great work of Ghanaram published only recently? It has, it is very true, been only printed very recently, and it is, therefore, little known to the reading public of Bengal. But published it had been, and very widely too, long before it was set up in type. As sung by professional singers, no work is more widely known them Dharma-mangala. Mukundar un's work is not recited more largely than Ghanaram's, The men, women, and children of every village in the interior know the story of Dharma-mangala by heart. It is only in the towns and cities and sub divisional head-quarters, where the people have lost much of their national traits of character and amusements as well, that Ghanaram is a comparative stringer. It has not been the lot of Ghartir in alone to be forgotten by "the cultivated" classes of his countrymen. Mikundar in has been equally forgotten by them. The enterprise of the Burtollah book-sellers has kept Mukundurant alive for the reading classes. Professic al reciters, however, have kept him alive for the over of the people. Ghanaram, too, has been all, ye known to the people, though he never received till lately the honour of print. The reading classe in towns and cities may have been imfamiliar with a m, But Ghanaram and his great work are more we'ly known than Bharat Chandra, the court poet of R ja Krishna Chandra. It is only in the metropolasin districts of Bengal that Annada mangala is read and admired. Notwithstanding the fact of its age, it has not been taken up by any class of professional saigers. Bharat intended his work to be sung, for that was the only method of publication known in his days. The repetition of the word pala at the end of his chapters, and the very naming of his work after the manner of his great predecessors, show this in- distinguished Kabrwalas whose contributions to the

was by the purest accident that a body of Calcutta amateurs adopted a portion of his story for a yatra that soon became popular, in the metropolitan districts, in the hands of one of their servants, viz., Gopal, the Uriyah, to whom, lafter one or two performances, they left their "properties". To suppose for one moment that the publication of Bharat Chandra's work has even equalled that of Ghanaram's, would betray a lamentable imacquaintance with the only national method of publication of poetical works. Mr. R. C. Dutt is a metropolitan Bengali, with a high English education, perfected in England. It is no disparagement to him to say that, brought up in English ideas, he has failed to catch the time test by which the publication of a Bengali poem is to be judged. He has, we believe, never heard a recitation, before a temple of Dharma, of Ghanaram's great work, or even of Mukundaram's Chandi on a village lawn or in the house of a substantial peasant. Hence it is that a few lines have been devoted by him to Ghanaram, while a whole chapter has been given to Bharat Chandra A cursory perusal, however, of Ghanaram will show that Bharat derived his inspiration, as regards many portions of his poem, from his great predecessor. It may be seen, again that, like Dryden disfiguring Shakespeare in his attempts to improve him, Bharat, in his attempts to retouch some of the pictures originally drawn by Ghanaram, has marred them materially. Bharat sang for the Court of a magnate. Ghanaram for the people. Many of the descriptions of Ghanaram that Bharat boldly borrowed, in passing through the crucible of the latter's mind, became tainted with the latter's besetting sin of licentiousness. The accepted estimate of Bharat's genius required to be recast after the printing of Ghanaram. The neglect to do it seriously detracts from the value of Mr. Dutt's book.

There is another omission in the volume that is more inexcusable. Rangalal Banerjee and his Padminir Upakhyana have been disposed of in three sentences. Among all those young men who sat at the feet of Iswar Gupta for learning the art of versification and cultivating the Bougali language, no one distinguished himself more than Rangalal Banerjee. The appearance of Padminir Upakhyana marked an era in the history of Bengali poetry. It represented the best specimen of work turned out by the Gupta School. There are passages in that poem which still stand unrivalled for fire and pathos in the whole range of Bengali poetry. The ode to Liberty, and the description of the field of battle with some touches borrowed from Byron's Destruct in of Semiacherib have not been surpassed by anything in Michael Dutt or Hem Chandra. A history of Bengali literature omitting a detailed reference to Rangalal and his Padmini is very like a history of English literature without a detailed reference to Moore or Campbell, or, better still, Scott, if the author believes that Rangalal's fame dwindled before that of Michael Dutt even as Scott's before Byron's. There is not a line in the poem that is dull; while as regards melody of versification, Rangalal stands immeasurably superior to Dimibandhu and Michael, about each of whom he author is so eloquent.

Not a line, again, occurs in the book touching the cause of Bengali poetry rank as high as those of any poet whom the author has mentioned. The songs of Ram* Bose and others among his competitors, if collected from old men who still recite or sing them with rapturous delight, would constitute a precious volume of the best poetry in the Bengali language Unfortunately, the authors of those songs did not avail themselves of the help of the printing press, and hence Mr. R. C. Dutt thinks that their productions were never published.

The contributions of Nobin Chunder Sen to Bengali poetry have been valued above those of Hem Chandra Banerjee. We are not surprised at this, Puff has done its work so effectually with regard to Babu Sen that we cannot blame Mr. R. C. Dutt for endorsing the judgment of the rabble. Hem Chandra is too thoughtful a poet to be appreciated by the uncultured horde of Bengali readers. The difference is very great between Hem Chandra and Nobin. The Brahman writes sense, the Vaidya writes non-sense. Nobin Chandra, we are told, is a veritable Byron. Others say that he is the poet of the Hindu revival. As both the verdicts are equally correct, we have in Sen a very strange Byron,—a Byron, that is, full of religious fervour and prepared to worship all the saints of the Hindu calendar. Bengal has produced many strange things, but never anything stranger.

The last chapter of the book, entitled " General Intellectual Progress" is a curious farago of prejudices and erudities. It betrays all the faults of a narrow spirit of party. While we are told that Soshi Chandra Dutt's English works come up to twelve goodly volumes, while a host of men have been mentioned, the briefest reference does not occur to the greatest Bengali of the age, viz., Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. It is impossible to suppose that the writer is unacquainted with the fact of the very large share which Dr. Mookerjee had in building up the fame of the weekly Hindoo Patriot. Hurish Chunder was succeeded by Sambhu Chunder, and after Sambhu Chunder came Kristodas Pal. We were not prepared to see the historian of intellectual movement in Bengal lend his aid to the intrigue that sought and still seeks to keep Dr. Mookerjee's name in the background. In an account of journalism in particular, such omission is even culpable. There is little hope for Bengal when a Bengali of even admitted culture like Mr. R. C. Dutt discovers such reluctance to honour one who towered far above his contemporaries and whom the greatest of Englishmen in India and literary men of other countries loved to honour. By the side of this, the mention of Chandi Charan Banerjee as the biographer of Vidyasagar, without naming the author of that delightful volume from which Chandi Charan has derived nearly all his materials, is a small affair.

take science, like astrology, phrenology, and many others, is devotion and ability of my two Chief Secretaries; said as regards the details of district work I have endeavoured to cure it by frequent tours of inspection and by systematic and eareful attention to details; and I hope sincerely that I have attained the ends unsound in the understanding of the author of phrenology.

in astrology as in phrenology. Palmistry too numbers many votaries. India, perhaps, is the home of palmistry as of astrology. There are many works extent in Sanskrit on palmistry. True or false, nobody can question that, like faces, the palms of different men present different marks. If a science can be sought to be constructed from the lines in caligraphy, if a thumb print be a true index to the man, it is the next step to study the lines and marks on the palm to learn not only the character but also the antecedents and the fortune of the man. Without vouching, therefore, for the truth of palmistry or endeavouring to demonstrate it as a superstition worthy only of weak understandings, we may observe that the book before us contains a mass of curious information or, rather, generalisations based upon the formation of the fingers and the lines and marks on the palm. We believe the present work is the first regular contribution, in Bengali, to the study of palmistry. Those desirons of verifying the generalisations may easily do so by examining not only their own palms but also those of triends and relatives. Several diagrams are given with full explanations of the marks on them. The subject has been treated in a systematic way. There are altogether 12 chapters. The entire matter is east in the form of questions and answers. The style is easy. Still one cannot hope to become a master of palmistry without close study and repeated experiments. It is necessary to bear in mind a large number of explanations or axiomatic statements. One must study the literature of palmistry thoroughly before one can nope to apply its rules for study of character.

THE CIVIL SERVICE DINNER TO SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT.

HIS REPLY TO THE TOAST OF THE EVENING.

I never realised till to-night how inadequate language is to express what I feel as regards the manner in which my colleagues of the Civil Stavice never assembled to bid me farewell and have received the flattering and eloquent remarks of my friend and former Secretary, Mr. Nolan, Mr. Chamberlain remarked in a recent speech that young men liked praise in thimblefuls, middle-aged men in tea spoonfuls, and old men in ladlefuls.

My experience is, however, quite the reverse, for as a voung man I am sure I could have swallowed any amount of praise without thinking it exceeded my deserts; while now, at my present time of life, when I look back on the pas, the re-ollections that arise are c iefly those of opportunities missed, of high ideals not attained, of attempts that have proved too hard for my hands to carry out, and of the constant presence of a feeling that it there were more than 24 hours in the day, the work would have been much better done. Such recollections cannot fail to be saddening, but to this inclancioly felling of re-trospection you have applied the bet, if not the only, remedy. For there is no judgment so severe and sound as that of the service to which one belongs, all the members of which know the details of one's career, before whom the whole of one's life lies open, and for whom the course of work is the same, the difficulties are similar, and they can thus best appreciate work done with complete "connaissance de cause." And therefore it is with mixed feelings of pride and humility that I look on the gathering of brother Civilians, betokening as it does the expression of their hearry good-will, as the highest praise I can desire, and the highest reward I can obtain. Mr. Nolan in his speech his alluded to the fact that I came five years ago as a stranger to this province, and has commented on the disadvantage under which I thus laboured. I have no doubt in my own mind that as an ordinary rule it is best for a province to have as its Lieutenant-Governor a man who is versed in its laws, customs and language, who has grown up ameng its people and knows from his youth the personnel of its governing body. Against my ignorance of these important matters I have only one advantage to adduce. In one Department of work, which has become of extreme importance and has largely developed in my time, the work of settlement, my experience as a settlement officer has been of great value. In other respects I have felt the dishas been of great value. In other respects I have settine dis-advantage of my position to be a serious one. As regards knowledge of the personnel of the service I have been greatly helped by the devotion and ability of my two Chief Secretaries; and as regards the details of district work I have endeavoured to cure it by frequent tours of inspection and by systematic and careful attention to details; and I hope sincerely that I have attained the ends aimed at, for the process has been a most laborious one. But it has with the officers of Government, of all ranks, in every district, and has enabled me to gain a knowledge of their life, of their difficulties, and how they have overcome them. It is this necessity of dealing with a greater mass of details which is the chief characteristic of a Civilian's duties, but it is not only in this country nor in this age of the world that the importance of administrative capacity has been felts the world that the importance or administrative capacity has been tells. Long ago I took for my motto a sentence, in which his views of the chief duties of Government were expressed, by Marcus Aurelius,—the Emperor-philosopher,—who ruled over a wider area than Bengal, but probably not over a larger population. He wrote. "There will never be a Republic of Plato" (or as we would say, thinking tather of Sir Thomas More than of Plato, "there will never be an Utopia.") "Let it suffice then to have improved things a little, and if successful in that do not count it a small thing." This is the size that the the fore more of the count of the size of the country and the size that the the fore more of the country as hittle size. the aim that I set before myself,—to improve things a little; and I trust that those who know me best will allow that I have made a constant and assiduous attempt, by paving attention to the details of administration, to remove friction, to oil the wheels of Government, attd so order things that nothing should be done simlessly, nor done twice over unnecessarily. In this connection I would mention one recent improvement, which though small in itself, is, I believe, a valuable and fruitful change; I m an the publication of the Annual Commissioner's Report " in extenso," instead of being boiled down and abstracted in a Government Resolution. These reports are, I and abstracted in a Government resolution. These reports at-think, of great use both to the service and to the public, as showing the thoughts which are brooding in the minds of the senior officers of Government and the lines on which they would carry out administrative improvements. I have made the following list of a few of the principal items touched on in their reports for last year.

The conduct and shortcomings of the Police--- the tendency to excessive severity in their punishments, the growth of unfounded charges against them. The territorial distribution of criminal cases the defects in the administration of Criminal Justice, the danger of holding up an impossibly high standard of evidence—floud and prolonged cheers)—the worship of the Fetish of the "First information at the Thans" (cheers)—the duty of the Magistrate to discover the truth of a case, not merely to weigh the preponderence of evidence. (Loud cheers).

The "Tauzi," procedure for the collection of Revenue.

The Registration of mutations in Government estates.

The objects and value of Sub-divisional Officer's tours.

The unsound character of the Provident Societies growing up in some districts. The mismanagements of pounds and ferries by District Boards.

The improvement of waterways and tow-paths, dev-lopment of roadside wells and of water-supply.

The liability of certain parts of the country to listress of

The principles of land acquisition compensation. The management of Ward's Estates. The effects on Excise Revenue of the local condition of the people.

Defects in the certificate procedure and "knock-out" sales of Relief by emigration to the congested population.

Forest protection and forestation.

And lastly I may mention the important question of the eff.ct of the fall in the price of silver on the prices of food. (Laughter.)
All these are matters as to which there is room for Administrative Improvement, or ground for serious thought. They are types of the custions which occupy the thoughts of the senior men, and their repo show the line they would take if they had full powers, and occurred the highest posts, for which I am assured they would be found to be fully competent, if only there were enough high posts for them to full I trust that the juniors in the service will bear these suggestions in mind, and remember that now it is their time to the directions that reforms should take, and to frame the policy they would wish to carry out if they rise to power; for nst as every soldier carries the possibility of a field-marshal's baton in he knapsack, so every Civilian should look on himself as a poten tial Lieutenant Governor The other day one of my friends amon; the juniors said to me in reference to this occasion, "Give us a watchword," I am hardly justified in giving a watchword, but I red that it is not out of place for me to give advice. I am not speaking to-day as a Lieutemant-Governor to officers under his orders, but it a said of many than the said of the said o hat a a senior member of a service which he deeply loves to the junior members of the same service, and perhaps after my long course of years in budia I may claim to speak as one of whom it may be said that in him

Old experience doth attain,

Old experience doth attain,
To something of prophetic strain.
The advice then that I would give you as that which is most peculiarly needed in the present time and under the present conditions is "Cultivate unlimited patience;" for the great danger that now confronts men of our race in India, and especially the younger among us, is that we are often tempted to give way to irritability of temper. I would venture again to quote from Marcus Aurelius as sentence of profound wisdom. It is the first sentence in the 2nd chapter of his thoughts. "Begin the day by saying to thyself, I shall meet with the busy body, the arrogant, the deceiful, the envious, the unsocial.' All these things happen to them by this envious, the unsocial. At these things happen to them by the ignorance of what is good or evil. But I who have seen the nature of the good that it is beautiful, and the bad that it is ugly, can neither the good that it is beautiful, and the bad that it is ugly, can neither be injured by any of them, nor can I be angry with my kinsman nor hate him." This spirit of philosophic calm and unlimited patience is the spirit which the juniors want when they have to face the annoyances in official life, attacks in the papers, and unceasonable opposition. I would ask you to remember in such cases the inferior education and lower position of such critics, and to look on the housile spirit in which they are a write to hook to look on the hostile spirit in which they act or write as their to look on the nostile spirit in which they act or write as their misfortune due to their ignorance, a failing to be forgiven rather than resented. Even the most bitter newspapers have from time to time criticisms which point out mistakes, and this may lead to improvements, and many of them combine sound views with candour and reasonableness. If, however, you find that to read any of these causes exe ssive irritation your best course is to leave them unread. Cultivate the grand disdain shown in the advice which Virgil gave to Dante in the famous wards " Non ragioniam di lor ma guarda

e passa."

Another point which Mr. Nolan touched on involves a principle which I hold to be most important, and which has underlain all my public actions,—"the principle of not washing dirty linest in public." I well remember in old days when we were juniors and serving together in a district in the Central Provinces how Sir Alfred Lyall and I discussed together, as I trust junior. Civilians discuss now, the lines on which the State should be governed; and one point on which we were both perfectly agreed was that, if we ever rose to high positions, there was one frequent missake we ever rose to nigh positions, there was one frequent miniske we at least would never be guilty of,... I mean the grave fault of publishing censure of the officers of Government. Such a procedure not only lowers the authority of the individual officers but destroys the prestige of the service. There is no place in the world to my knowledge where the Government has publicly wlated to the contract of dozen and the land the Honor its officers, as I have seen it done in India. In England the Home Secretary, when he corrects a mistake or modifies a sentence, does not publish the remarks which convey his censure. are matters to be done --- if done at all --- in private. If the French Government disapproves of and removes a prefet, the sentence must become known, but no Government Resolution is blazoned abroad in the papers. Censure no doubt is necessary at times, but it should be private and confidential. Above all things bewate of giving over our officers to the wolves! (Loud cheers). And in India we have a special reason for this policy, because such centure India we have a special reason for this policy, pecause such censure to rarely, if ever, needed. I do not speak, gentlemen, with a desire to lutter and please so friendly an audience. But the efficiency of the service to so great, and the zeal so conspicuous, every Maristate and Julge is so trying his level best to do his day's work conscious only under special difficulties of climate and want of the product of the product of the production of the places. work conscience only under special difficulties of climate and want of companio come in solitary places, that it is quite unnecessary, if a mistake occas, to apply the stimulous of the official lash. In all the cares the 1 know of, where mistakes have been made, the severest an const adequate punishment has been the conscience of the officer. Great as the efficiency of the service is, there is still room for it convenient and advance, and I trust that all sections of the service of the service is the service of ontiltue 10 aim at the highest standard attainable. I or twin onclinate to similar the ingress standard astandard, sprak especially to the juniors, who should hook to their seniors for encouragement, advice and example. They should remember that: furnielies in their hands, and that when changes take of tt will place as like place they must---to meet the development country and to read just the relations of Government with the pirations of the people, it will be their duty to so give effect to pirations of the people, it will be their duty to so give effect to them that there may be no disturbance, and the interest of people and Government may be safeguarded and advanced.

I have now only got to add my hearties chanks for the cordial way in which Lady Ribott's name and the landatory remarks 1

Mr. Nolan about her have been received. It is quite unneces at for me to las stress on what a helpmeet she has been to me in my positio in every branch, and on how I should have failed in one import out point of my duties—the social sides—vithout her. I that the language used, and the knowledge that it is can only say that the language need, and the knowledge that it is echoed by filinds throughout the province will be the best ionic to effectually restore her to health again.

In conclusion, I have to ask you all to drink the health of niv old friend and successor, Sir A. Mackenzie. I have known him to many years and have followed his long and distinguished career many years and have tollowed his long and distinguished career with the certainty that he would in time arrive at the post he is now about to take up. It seems only a short time agothat Sir Stenart Bayley vacated Belvedere for me, and how again I am vacating it for Sir A. Mackenzir. The objects which have been so familiar to me are packed and cleared away, and the house he had a cannot deep his occuration. The more of Once the help occuration. being prepared for his occupation. The words of Omar Khvamm come back to me---

'Tis but a tent where takes his one day's rest A Sultan to the realm of Death addrest ;

The Sultan rises and the dark Farash Strikes and prepares it for another guest.

The "other guest" does not labour under the same disadvantage as I did. As an old member of the Bengal Service he is acquainted with the service, with its traditions, and, to some extent, with its perthe service, with its treatment and after his brilliant career the one thing needed to secure his success in Bengal is your loyal and efficient co-operation after the manner in which you have given it to me. I can promise it on your behalf to him. (Loud cheers.) .

Gentlemen, I call on you to drink the health of Sir A.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE'S REPLY.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who was received with loud applause, said :-- I have to thank Sir Charles Elliott for the terms in he has been good enough to propose my health, and you, gentlemen, for the cordial manner in which you have received the toast. I feel none the less that my presence here to-night calls really for apology, and that the intrusion of my extraneous personality between the Service and their guest of the evening would have been indeed unpardonable had it not been condoned by Sir Charles Elliott's expressed wish, and the consequent and courteous invitation of your Committee.

I am, I need hardly say, delighted to have an opportunity given me of meeting thus early so many members of the Service to which I am proud to belong, and with whom I look forward to pleasant and profitable association during the coming years, the more so as I have been so long absent from Bengal that a new official generation has meanwhile arisen that "knows not Joseph" and has yet to learn what to make of him. yet to learn what to make of nim.

On returning once more to my province of origin 1 should like to be allowed at the outset to say this one thing---that while I have been long enough absent to shed perhaps some of my Bengal prejudices, I have not as yet either abjured Bengal principles or forgotten my Bengal friendships. (Cheers.)

Gentlemen, I appreciate to the full the difficulties of my position is a standard as a Alministrator of such association in the standard as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such association in the standard such association in the standard such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the standard such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such association in the such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such as a Maninistrator of such in succeeding an Administrator of such strong individuality, such bild initiative, and such consummate grasp of detail as Sir Charles perings the man did it is any, that he was able nevertheless to maintain a reasonable continuity of policy and administration, and under him Bengal absorbed and assimilated as reforms what it had been at first disposed to resent as innovations. I am not without hope that history will now again repeat itself. It will not indeed be my fault if it fails to do so. (Cheers.)

And I am encouraged in taking up the burden laid upon me-appalling as at times it seems in prospect—by the knowledge that I shall have within reach many friendly advisers, European and Native, official and non-official,—with whom I am in cordial sympathy, and apon whose knowledge of the province up to date I

Already here I find myself surrounded by not a few familiar faces. In the chair is one of my oldest friends in India, and I rejoice to In the chair is one of the other triends in india, and i rejoice to believe that with him and with the other members of the High Court, my relations are likely to be in the future, as they always were in the past, not merely amicable but intimate. I do not recognise, I never will recognise, in this old and highly organised province, any possibility of friction, industry, or antagonism between the Judicial and executive branches of the Administration. Their respective functions ought to be, and I believe can be, so co-ordinated as to secure the smooth and efficient action of both. We are one service, working under one Government, seeking not our own individual or sectional advantage and glory, but the common weal of the vast population committed to our charge. I look to you, my brother Civilians, to sid me in realising and maintaining this, the traditional ideal of our service--- and to that end God help us all. (Checrs.)

Passing on from the High Court I find in the Revenue Board two other old frierds, unrivalled for their knowledge of the pro-whice in all its parts, whom I shall hope to associate very closely with myself in the administration of that great congeries of depart-

Most of the Commissioners are old acquaintances, from the genial and judicious Forbes at Patna, to the quaintly caustic Luckman's at Dacca---while in the middle kingdom I find an old school and college mate in Grimley at Rauchi, and a quondam famine assistant in Toynbee at Bhagalpur. The same is true of many of the senior Judges and in an especial degree of the three Civil Secretaries whose services, abilities, and experience I am fortunate in retaining.

Of the younger men the acquaintance is yet to make, but I trust we shall part eventually with as much mutual esteem and friendly regard as has brought us all together to-night to do honour to Si Charles Elliott. Meantime I will only assure them of this, that it has been my steadfast aim during the nine years I have held charge of provincial Governments to give to every subordinate full and public credit for all good work done. I find this the best way toget work done. The newspapers have at times described me as a hard and exacting task-master. But gentlemen, you will not judge me from newspapers or any other report. Judge me as you find me, and remember, too, that hitherto I have had to deal with some-what backward provinces: manned to a large and even embarrassing extent by untrained men or by effect survivals of an exploded non-regulation system; and though I had the assistance both in the non-regulation system; and though I had the assistance both in the Central Provinces and Burma of many officers as able and devoted as are to be found in any part of India, the "tails of the teams" took at times a lot of driving. In Bengel, with its admirably trained service and its sound traditions, I look forward to no more arduous task than that of devising, if possible, new epithets and phrases of commendation and approval.

Gentlemen, I have no policy to announce to you save that embodied in my native Doric in the words " Ca'Canny." we shall together do some useful work, and the less dust we raise in the doing of it the better I think it will be for the country and for ourselves. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

No, there is nothing to it to wonder at. They went through the same experience, and express it in the most natural way, that's all.

But what shoes it mean? Are people suspicious of pulsamed food? No, no; that is not so. The food is not poisoned before it is eaten, but afferwards. An example will show what teally occurs, and why so many are affail to est.

We quote from one of the letters: "One night, early in 1892," says the writer, "I was seized with dreadful pains in the pin of the stomach, and a choking sensation in the inional. I feared I was going to die, my wife called in a neighbour. They applied hot flamels and unpentine, but I gut no relief. "Getting no real benefit from the first doctor I saw another, who said I had eally gement of the liver. He gave me medicines, but I got no better. In August I went to Exmouth to see what my native air would do for me, but came buck worse thore even. Soon afterwards I was back at my wink. The people in the office, seeing how well. I looked, asked what had caned me, and answered Mother Seigel's Syrup. I shall be glad to reply to an inquiries about my case. (Signed) Charles Harris, 74, Beiesford Stiee Cambei well, London, December 1st, 1892."

Mr. Harris' statement goes strought to the point. Why was a firand to eat? Bacause his food gave him pain without giving his strength. This was dead wrong. It was exactly the reverse of what should have been. When a man is the proper form he gets vigour an power from his meals, and eats them with enjoyment and relish. If doesn't there is something the matter with him. What is it?

Now let your thoughts expand a bit, so as to take on a broad principle. One man's meat is another man's poison, they say. Thal's a but it's only half the truth. Any man's meat is any man's poison, they say. Thal's a but it's only half the truth. Any man's meat is any man's poison, must refer than the mill hopp two should never have bread, and if bread (or other food) never for how bread is in the sad rots. The fermentations product one it which is the main thing after all.

But Mother Seigel's Carative Svrno does, as Mr. Harris snys, at a thousand of other say.

A Wonderful Medicine.

It is not that amid the pressure of harassing official duties an English Civilian can find either time or opportunity to pay so graceful viribute to the memory of a native persuality as F. H. It is characteristic of the nonle service to which Mr. Skrine's helongs; that such a book should have issued from its ranks. Dr. Monkeripe was no optimist. One of his brilliant specohes contained the following sentence:—" India contained the following sentence:-" India has neither the soil nor the elasticity enjoyed by young and vigorous communities, but present the arid rucks and deserts of an effect citilization, hardly stirred to a somblance of life by a foreign occupation doning over its easily-gained advantages." This was true of the pre-Mutiny India of 1851. If it is not longer true of the Queen's India of 1895, ga owe it is no small measure to Indian forty silke Dr. Monkerjee who have laboured, amid some juisepreheinstion, to ghicken the time of misrepresentation, to quicken the samblance of life into a living reality.—The Times, (London) October 14, 1893.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE MEETING OF THE WITANGEMOT, A SONG OF THE HOUR.

ERIC BRIGHTEYES.

Abasar (or Bengali pieces written at leisure) by Mr. Barada Charan - Mitra, M.A., of the Civil Service, contains many short poems of merit. Mr. Mitra is a thorough master of versification. Eminently suited as the Bengali language is to almost every kind of metre, it assumes in Mitra's hands a plasticity that is remarkable. Abasar is by no means unworthy of the author whose metrical translation of the Cloud Messenger is regarded as one of the best performances in the line. It argues well for the future of Bengali literature that men of such culture as Mr. Mitra, feel a disposition for it in the midst of engrossing official duties. The book concludes Two English sonnets---one to the Queen and the other to the Viceroy, both of which have appeared in these columns, and another piece of poetry, with which we open our present number, on the passing of Mr. Paul's resolution in Parliament for simultaneous examination of the Indian Civil Service in England and India. It deserves wider recognition.

In conneil met the Wise Men old, * Their brows agleam with wisdom bold, And thus their rightenus minds they told, In accents deep and low, Riving the stience of the Hall, They rang against the oaken wall,-They rang, on anvil hammer's fall,-Clear, distinct and slow.

The Spokesman, chosen of the band, Deep in mind and strong of band,-, He stood in posture of command, In flowing robes bedight ; His long white heard, his face serene, His deep-brow-roofed bright grey eyes keen, And close-curve lips, and stately mien, Bespoke his manhood's height.

III.

Upon the silence of the Hall, With hammer-weight his words did fall, " Rivering truth to soul of all,-Truth and justice fair : And thus, in accents deep and low, Ontspoken, clear, distinct, and slow, With leap and break of cataract-flow, Fell his eloquence rare

" Hearken, brothers, what I say, Hearken, ere you give it 'nay', O ponder well, and win to-day The golden crown of fame ; Crown giant strength with gentleness, Crown towering mind with will to bless, . With large-souled Justice' deathless grace O crown your hearts of flame !

" Our tuneful bards sing, rapt in fire, Striking loud the patriot lyre, How, in chapman-like attire,

Our Viking fathers bold, Across blue ocean's milk-white foam, Like lords of sea, did dauntless roam, Scorning the joys of love and home, • . . In pirate quest of gold ;

, VI. " How, spurning ocean's angry surge, Despoiling many a lovely marge, With trusty sails their good ships large,

Careering proudly flew, Past Sun-set Ocean's mountain-swell, And past the land where black men dwell, To where the day-god throws his spell In morning's rosy hne.

VII.

" Pirates from north and south they fought, And run red full soon they brought, Till foes, in the, their mercy sought,-Such valunt sea-dogs they !-

Till the Sun-rise L tod in groan of pain Of fends that tore her frame in twain, *With bended kaees - and not in vain-

> To them for help did pray, VIII.

" She had her sagas and her saws, She had her gods, she had her laws, Her ancient sons did win applause

. In feats of mind and arm :-Twas prond to lend a helping hand, Full proud to burst ber uon band, Yea, proud, this glorious Sun-rise Land To shield from fear and harm !

IX. From love of pow'r, from love of gold, from love of fime, our fathers bold ent mighty help; and, O behold !

A goodly empire grew; Beneath their peace-dispensing might, Red feud was quelled, black wrong set right ; A kingdom great, so fair, so bright, No monarch ever knew.

"They poured new blood into her frame,—
She had been pale, and halting lame,—
Till on the Sun-rise Land there came
The sun-rise hue of health;
. They fed her with our sagas' lore,
And with our bards' rich music-store;—
In gladness, lavish did she pour
Into their lap her wealth.

XI.

"Full swift she leapt from hue to hue,
Swift sped red blood her blue veins through,
At heart she joy and gladness knew,—

This beauteons Land of Dawn;
And covered by our fathers' might,
She brought forth children strong and bright,
O brothers, 'twas a goodly sight,
To see them 'bout her drawn!

"Our brothers they ;—though ontward datk, In them bright glows our fathers' spark, Attentively, O brothers, bark!
In their fair cause I plead:
Distant wails through midnight gloom.

Distant wails through midnight gloom,
Across wide ocean's thindrons boom
To me have come, like voice of tomb,—
I have your wisdom's need."

XIII.

With this, he paused a breathing-space, A light shot o'er his manly grace. Expectantly upon his face.

The gathered With he echoes then.

He paused until the echoes deep Swooned and sank in silence-sleep, Then forth again high words did leap, From deepest feeling spring

XIV.

" Now, listen, Wise Men, to my tale, Made half of preau, half of wail, Glory and lapse in equal scale,

A tale of love and hate,

Struggles of honor and of self,
Of high resolve and soudid pelf,
Of god of truth and lying elf,—
The tale I now relate

χv

"Our sites unto our brothers swore, —
"We'll cherish you for ever-more,"
And made this known the country o'er,
In solemn pledge of love;
The Sunrise Land, like morning sky,
Blushed Joy at face, and glowed at eye,
And wafted thanks in grateful sigh
To gods that dwell above.

XVI

"Anon dark doubts and jealons fear Shadawed our fathers' conscience clear. They thought of m,—to them more dear. They thought, and thoughtful grew. But justice came and chased away This gathering twingut's threatened sway, Unclouded yet remained the day,—

Then pledge they swore anew XVII.

"Our dusky brothers with content
On words of truth and honor leant,
The news from home to home was sent
In leaping joy's throb;—
They linked their darksome brow with ours,
They poured their heart in ruddy showers
In rooting deep our fathers' powers,
"Without a groan or sob:

XVIII

"Till from the White Head Peak that takes
The first red ray, when Day-god wakes,
And, raining gold, his splendour shakes
Upon the sleeping earth,
To where the lapping ocean-wave
From dawn to dawn doth ceaseless lave
The land of palm and coral cave,
Of pearls the place of birth,—

XIX.

"The reeking sword in peace ensheathed,—
With joy-bright face in smile enwreathed,—
A living empire heaved and breathed,
Three-hundred-million-sonled;
To north, to south, to east, to west,
Flashed with light its beanteous breast,—
A scroll of fame, ray fringed, and prest
With letters all of gold!"

xx

Like distant thunder's muffled din,
Arose a sound the Hall within,
In praise of great and high Wodin,—
The Speaker's voice was drowned;
Full soon again came silence deep,
Full soon from him high words did leap,
Like waterfall from craggy steep,
And through the Hall resound.

XXI.

"Alas lost faith and palsied will !—
Our fathers never did fulfil
The promise made,—their thoughts were still Turned upon us here;
And 'mid the triumph, glory-gut,
Of present strength, they wanton hurt
Our brother-warriors' tenderest part,

In rash disdam of fear. XXII

"So Hela's flame possessed their soul,
Now mad, infuriate, past control,
To vengeance, now their only goal,
They rushed through path of blood.
Drowned were mem'ries of days gone by,
Drowned reverent lave, and purpose high,

Grinly raged from sky to sky
The red unholy flood,

he red unhaly flood, XXIII.

"A moment's fit;—the plunges wild
Of haishly-treated feeling child!—
Full soon then foolish hearts beginted
Tasted dread remoise,—
Swiftly the scourge came—sure enow!—
Hung—ghastly sight!—on every bough,
With mangled form and branded brow,
Our tebel brothers' corse!

XXIV.

"Now came the Mother's yearning heart When father's rod had done its part, With loving strokes She southed the smart, She kissed them in her tear; She said in golden voice of May,—
'Let cease your rough-rude Viking way, Feeling hearts need gentler sway,

Now love shall rule, not fears.'
XXV.

"Out rang the trumper golden-tongue,
L ke gladdening hurst of spring-time song,—
'It is Our will, Our sons among
No caste for skin shall be;
Our children dark, Our children white,
Shall of Our sinde have equal light,
Ye holy gods, before your sight
This sacred oath take We'!"

XXVI.

The Hall was builed in silence deep,
As if encound in tranced sleep,
One almostical the great heart-leap what bear 'neath bursting ribs;
A prefere seemed to fill the Holl,
In Aenn awe deep-wrapt were all;
yeth dreadsome echoes 'gamst the wall
Re-oped the speaker's lips;

XXVII

"The tomb has closed o'er many a year,
It came in hope, it died in tear,
Which froze upon its hard and sere

And water-withered cheek,
The tear far pang of hope deferred,—
For honer's sacced pledges maried,—
For justice' truthful claims unheard,—
For patient suffering meek.

XXVIII.

" Many such years!—They came and work From rose-hued May to winter hour;— The solemn oaths our fathers swore

A mockery still remain;
And still our Mother's sacred vow,
Taken with heavenward-raised brow,—
O shaine, that it is even now
Mere empty word and vain!

XXIX.

O shame, that still our brothers weep Jpon our honor's death-like sleep,— Jur promise to the ear we keep, And break it to the hope! a this your curse, ye gods, for crime,— s this your curse, ye gods, for crome,—

"rom starry height of truth sublime,
That helpless, hopeless, we should climb
Down falsehood's slimy slope?

XXX.

In wisdom great, O brothers all!
Do you not feel, amid this Hall,
The ghostly tread, the gods! footfall,
In nutraged majesty,
If dreaded Thor and fierce Wodin,
If gentle Freya and Norns thin?—
This darkness weired, this ghostly din,
O brothers, hear and see!

XXXI.

That rushed from heart to eye, 'aok' thought, in that tunndlinous care, Int there, by drops, to bring disgrace, ind, rushing higher up the face,

XXXII.

And when relaxed the godly spell,
With heat divine their hearts did swell,
They said, with will which none could quell,
In accents deep and low,
"By Mother's oath and Wodin's name,
We'll wipe this blot of blackest shame,
We'll went the golden crown of fame !"—
The echoes faded slow.

It has been no merry Christimus to the Viceroy. Suffering from a severe child lie has been obliged to keep to his held. He was unable in consequence to drive in state to the races on the 24th, when his cup was tue, or to go to Barrackoore for Christimus. It is a relief to learn that there is improvement in his condition.

Mithammedan will preside over the forthcoming Session of the Indian National Congress, which will be held at Poona during the closing days of the year." Mr. Guidan Hewart ought to have been better informed. The Banerjee President of the year, is no Mussalman by both nor a convert to Islam. He is proud of his Brahman blood, and has professed no other faith than his ancestors'. If the editor of "In ba" was not informed betimes of the name of the President-elect, the Congress Committees in India must answer for the misannouncement. Supposing the Honble Surendra-Nath's caste and forth unknown at head quarters, who is the distinsuished Mahomedan Mr. Hewart had in his mind's eve when he wrote? If his health had permitted it, a retired Bengah Judge of the Calcutta High Court, but no Mahomedan, would have led the deliverations of the Indian National Assembly of the year,

THE WEEK'S TELEGRAMS IN BRIEF, WITH OCCASIONAL COMMENTS

THERE is general disquiet in business circles, and the heavy foreign selling has caused a semi-panic in the New York market, where several prominent failures have taken place. The losses are estimated at one thousand million dollars. The collapse in New York has reflected on London and the Continental Bourses. The panic is generally ascribed to President Cleveland's policy in regard to Venezuela and the manimous adoption by the Senate, without any amendment, of the Bill passed by the House of Representatives for a commission on the Venezuela frontier question.

President Cleveland has signed the Venezuela Commission Bill. The adoption of the Bill by the Senate is ascribed to the desire of the Republicans to cast the whole responsibility in the matter on Mr. Cleveland.

The ending bankers and merchants in several cities are strongly urging Congress to exercise prudence in dealing with the Venezuelan question.

The House of Representatives have sent Mr. Cleveland's financial message to the Committee on Ways and Meaus.

Heavy sales of American securities continue at New York on behalf of Great Butain and the Continent, entailing a large drain on gold. The Supply of Ways and Means Committee of the Huuse of Representatives advocates an increase in the tariff and a popular Bond Bill.

The tone of the American press is decidedly calmer, and the feeling towards Great Britain is more friendly. This is notably the case with the New York Tribine, which has entirely changed its tone and now urges the preservation of peare.

The utiesances of the clergy from the pulpit throughout the United States on Sungay strongly deprecated war.

It is believed at Washington that the Venezuelan dispute will eventually end in a peaceful and honourable settlement. President Cleveland's political and financial discredit is increasing, and the markers are improving though still sensitive.

PRESIDENT Cleveland has sent a fresh message to Congress, in which he states that the continued exputs of gold demand immediate action to protect the reserve in the Treasury. He urges Congress not to go into recess before enacting legislation to relieve the dangers of the present emergency, and avert the sacrifice of the peoples' interests and the impairment of public credit. The Senate has passed a resolution ordering the Futance Committee to enquire as to the expediency of opening the mosts in free counage of silver. The Ways and Means Committee's bills provide for the imposition of duties which will be equivalent to sixty per cent of the M-Killey rates on wool, wouldens, and lumber; also a general increase of fifteen per cent, on the present duties, and the issue of short term Gavernment Bonds in order to produce a gold reserve. It is believed that the silver party, especially in the Senate, will refuse to pass the hills nuless large concessions are mide. The House of Representatives by a large majority have passed the new Tauff Bill, increasing the revenue by forty million dollars aunually.

In response to a request from the New York World, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York have telegraphed that they cannot but believe that the present crisis will be arranged satisfactorily, and that in both countries it will be succeeded by a revival of the old and warm friendship. Mr. Gladstone, in response to an appeal from the same quarter for a word of peace and fellowship, has telegraphed that he dare not interfere, and that only common conse is required.

ITALY is recalling the majority of her squadro from the Levant. The Powers appear to be averse to active interventing in Turkey, for the present. Partisans of the Armenians are much chabined at this.

THE Times, in commenting on the agitation in England, favour of intervention on behalf of the Armenians, urges that it is incossible for England to act alone in the matter.

THE Torkish troops defeated the Druses on the 19th instant. Christia, Assistant Governors have been appointed at St. Sevas, Bitlis, and Erzeroum.

A MOVEMENT is observable in England in favour of the proposal by the Duke of Argyll to invite Russia to undertuke the pacification of Armenia.

LORD Salisbury has telegraphed to Nubar Pasha that the Queen has appointed him a Knight Commander of the Star of India, in token of Her Majesty's regard for his services in upholding cordial relations between England and Egypt.

THE Cairo correspondent of the Times states that the harmony between British and Native officers in Egypt was never so complete as at present, and that Mustapha Fehiny Pasha is continuing Nubar Pasha's policy.

THE Turkish troops have captured Zeitin. The fighting which preceded the capture of the town was of an obstinate character. The Armenians lost two thousand five hundred men, while the Turkish loss was two hundred and fifty.

THE National Union of the Transvial British Society has addressed a manifesto to the people deminding equitable constitutional rights. There is much agulation at Johannesburg owing to runnurs of a projected oprising of the foreign element, and many citizens are advising moderation.

ACCORDING to the Manchester Guardian, it is not improbable that the English aguation against Indian cotton duties may result in a 5 per cent, duty on all imported yarns and yarns spin by power machinery in British India, and a reduction of import duty on cloth from 5 to 3½ per cent. The India Office cannot too long resist the Lancashue demands.

SUNDAY is not a dies non in India. The law has ceased to recognize it as such. The prohibition too of 1852 against officials making over or assuming charge on a Sunday has been modified. On the ruling of the Accountant General that Article 254 of the Civil Service Regulations is no bar to such transfer, an order has been unde that no charge of an office is to be assumed on a Sunday unless such a course is absulutely necessary.

WE publish in another column the finding of the District Magistrate of Hooghly, to whom it was transferred by the High Court, on the action of the District Magistrate of Nadia in the Ranaghat petroleum prosecution. We do not usually find a Magistrate in charge of a district so obedient to the law as Mr. Geake. Whether he takes a right view or not of chapter X of the Criminal Procedure Code dealing with Public Nuisances and their speedy prevention and suppression, the Magistrate of Hooghly shows a judicial temper, which, if found in every Magistrate in his own district, would be an effected answer to the cry, becoming lauder and londer, for the separation of indicial and executive functions. Mr. Geake thinks the owner of the petroleum depôt, while taking the usual precautions against conflagration or explosion, often disregarded them, Yei, following the directions of the Code, he abstains from making any order or recommendation, and simply rules that the order of the Nadia Magistrate is not reasonable and proper. The prosecution, therefore, drops, for, under the Code, "no further proceedings shall be taken." But do the troubles of Ankhoy Kumar Ghose end here? Is the magistracy of Nadia precluded from issuing another modified notice such as the Magistrate of Houghly would uphold?

Or the Behar Chiefships, Dumrann, the first in rank, has been foremost in all movements started by authority for the benefit of the Indian peoples. The chief credit of it has always been the Dewan's, but for whom the fate Miharaji or the present Miharani, would not have been so prominent. For ail his exemions for the Raj Rai Iai Prakash Lei Bahadur has been always allowed a fire hand by his master and his mistress and otherwise rewarded. His services have been more than once recognized by Government by accepting him a member of the Bengal Legislative Council and conferment on him of tules of honour and distinction. He has been fortunate enough to belong to the same Emment Order of the Indian Empire to which his late master was admitted though in a lower rank, Both the Hindu and Mahomedan tenantry of Dumraon have prosounced themselves in his favour by calling him respectively Separi-quam and Mohsin-ul-Mulk. The Pandits of Benares, the beloved city of Bishweshwar, have presented him an address with a copy of Manava-dharm castra-which they describe as-" benediction in its embodied form; which is to those devoted to the acquisition of Brahma a temple for practising concentration of mind; to those who have renounced the world the temple for subjugation of the senses; to the regenerated their all; to persons even skilled in politics a deep mystery; to the weak their means of rescue; to those with uplifted rods their rod of chastisement; to treaders on the path of morality their grace; the essence of the three Vedas; the armour of the science of rule; the religious rite of those that are wedded to such rites; the righteousness of the righteous; in short, the means of happiness unto all living creatures in the world." The latest demonstration is reported from Ghazipore. The reises there held a reception in his honour. The Town Hall was decorated, and many were present.

IT is believed that Mr. Westinacott will go to the Board of Revenue when Mr. Lyall sinks into a Superintendent of the Cooch Behar State, and Mr. Oldham succeeds Mr. Westmacott as Commissioner of the Presidency Division. What is the place reserved for the Houble H. J. S. Cotton ?

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, December 28, 1895. SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT AT THE CIVIL SERVICE DINNER.

SIR Charles Elliott's speech, at the farewell dinner which his brother Civilians gave him, was, no doubt, intended as a defence of his five years' administration of Bengal. From a literary point of view, the speech is almost unique. The Indian Civil Service consists of many able men whose facile pens have given to the world many able productions on all manner of subjects. An Indian Civilian, however, on his legs is quite a different person from himself with a pen. The talent for speaking, although the opportunities are many for cultivating it, rarely distinguishes him. Even set speeches are seldom made without the written copy in hand for consulting when memory fails to supply the cue. We do not know how Sir Charles acquitted himself on the occasion. But there can be no doubt that, as reported in the papers, his utterances betray a literary grace and finish that are of a high order.

Garnished with quotations from Marcus Aurelius and Virgil, and even from the Rubbayyat of Omar Khayyam, the after-dinner speech of the late Lieutenant-Governor is unquestionably a clever production not unworthy of his literary reputation. It is impossible, however, to peruse it without a sigh at the thought of the many signal failures committed by its author in the practical work of administration. No one can deny him the credit of even thorough conscientiousness and the desire of doing good, as also a capacity for grasping details. Unfortunately, a ruler of men must have other qualities than these to achieve success. Sir Charles expatiated before his self lacked anything more than any other, it was this very virtue of patience. He was as impatient an administrator as any we have seen. His great fault was that as soon as he conceived an idea, he could not rest without seeking to apply it in practice with little regard for the dust he would raise. A Non-Regulation Province, with very little written law to regulate its affairs, and with the unchecked will of those in power doing duty for law and precedent, was the fittest sphere for a man like him. An administration regulated by law would be the ruin of talents such as his. Institutions built up by the united wisdom of a large body of men and working without friction for years together, he adventured to retouch and reform with as little deliberation as if he were giving orders to his own steward about how a particular tree in his own garden should be trimmed or a parterre relaid and replanted. A strong reliance on his own understanding and a general idea of his own intellectual superiority were his besetting sins. The strength of constitutional Government lies in the fact of the little capacity its head for the time being has to introduce changes in the name of reform. Individual opinion has little room for play in constitutional rule. The head of a Province like Bengal is bound to fail if he seeks to regulate the administration by his own will. Vigour degenerates into lawlessness, and reliance on one's own judgment developes into personal caprice., The great fault of the late Lieutenant-Governor was his contempt for other people's opinions and his belief in his own infallibility

As a vindication of his own administration, his speech deserves to be examined with care by any one wishing to apportion him praise or blame for his several measures. Unmistakable evidences occur in it of Sir Charles Elliott's contempt for the law. One of the greatest compensations that British rule has offered to the people of India for loss of freedom is the glorious fabric of British law and British law-courts. Barring acts of State, the Sovereign herself of the Empire has to submit her claims, arising out of municipal law, to the same courts of justice that exist for the people. The same procedure regulates her suits as the suits of the subject. An aggrieved subject may put her Majesty into court for a breach, actual or imagined, of his rights, with as much freedom as if he were proceeding against a fellow-subject. Asiatic legislators have, it is true, spoken of the divinity of the law and represented it as of more authority than the king himself. Passages may be quoted from Manu about the power of the law to command the king; but Mann himself, in his most liberal mood, would have stared with wonder at the attempt of a subject to sue the sovereign or at the sovereign's resolve to submit to the arbitrament of his own judges in such a dispute. The strongest pillar of British rule in India is not British justice, but British justice as dealt out according to British law by the British courts, civil and criminal. Sir Charles Elliott might be the justest of men, but it was not his justice that could satisfy the people. Justice, administered according to the law of the realm by Judges and Magistrates conforming to that law, is, perhaps, the most precious boon that British rule has given to India. Any attempt to tamper with that boon cannot fail to be viewed with alarm by the whole country. The late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, in seeking to strengthen British rule, sought hearers on the necessity of patience. But if he him- to undermine its very key-stone. It was an unholy attempt, and in so far as it succeeded, it should be deplored by all honest men. No measure of good will towards the people, no capacity for mastering the details of administrative measures, even no real reform of abuses, could compensate for such a grave blunder. The apologists of Sir Charles Elliott, while glibly speaking of his virtues, fail to realise this fact. Read the following, uttered by Sir Charles Elliott himself, amid the loud plaudits, if the newspaper reports are correct, of his hearers belonging to the same Service as himself :-

" I would mention one recent improvement which, though small in itself, is, I believe, a valuable and fruitful change; I mean the publication of the Annual Commissioner's Report in extenso instead of being boiled down and abstracted in a Government Reso-These reports arc, I think, of great use both to the Service and to the public, as showing the thoughts which are brooding in the minds of the senior Officers of Government and the lines on which they would carry out administrative improvement. I have made the following list of a few of the principal items touched on in their reports for last year: the conduct and shortcomings of the police; the tendency to excessive severity in their punishments, the growth of unfounded charges against them; the territorial distribution of criminal cases; the defects in the administration of criminal justice; the danger of holding up an impossibly high standard of evidence--(loud and prolonged cheers), --- the worship of the fetish of the first Information at the Thana' -- (cheers), --- the duty of the Magistrate to discover the truth of a case, not merely to weigh preponderance of evidence. (loud cheers) :-- the 'Tauzi' procedure for the collection of Revenue; the registration of mutations in Government estates; the objects and value of sub-divisional officers' tours; the unsound character of the Provident Societies growing up in some districts; the memanagement of pounds and ferries by District Boards; the improvement of waterways and towpaths, development of roadside wells and of water-supply; the liability of certain parts of the counretry to distress by famine; the principles of land acquisition compensation; the management of Wards' Estates; the effects on Excise Revenue on the condition of the people; defects in the certificate procedure and 'knockout' sales of land; relief by emigration to state procedure and 'knockout' sales of land ; relief by emigration to the congested population; forest protection and afforestation. And lastly, I may mention the important question of the effect of the fall in the price of silver on the prices of food, (Laughter.) All these are matters as to which there is room for administrative improvement, or ground for serious thought. They are types of the questions which occupy the thoughts of the senior men, and their reports show the line they would also if the head of the senior men. which occupy the inoughts or the senior men, and their reports snow the line they would take if they had full powers, and occupied the highest posts, for which I am assured they would be found to be fully competent, if only there were enough high posts for them to fill! I trust that the juniors in the Service will bear these suggestions in mind, and remember that now is their time to consider the directions that reforms should take, and to frame the policy they would wish to carry out if they rise to power; for just as every soldier carries the possibility of a field-marshal's baton in the knapsack, so every Civilian should look on himself as a potential Lieutenant-Governor.

In presenting the topics included in the reports of Divisional Commissioners, Sir Charles did not treat his audience to a mere abstract of contents of a particular species of public documents, but wished to impress it upon his hearers that the heads touched offered types of questions that engaged the thoughts of the District administrations and that they pointed out the directions that reform should take, and that, therefore, the younger men in the Service should, by their light, frame the policy they should wish to carry out if they rose to power. "The defects in the administration of Criminal Justice; the danger of holding up an impossibly high standard of evidence; the worship of the fetish of the 'first Information at the Thana'; the duty of the Magistrate to discover the truth of a case, not merely to weigh preponderance of evidence,"-these short heads embody a policy utterly subversive of British law as administered by British Judges and Magistrates trained in that law. It has been the glory of Britain to build up a criminal law, both substantive and adjective, that is the admiration of the whole civilised world. The wisest and greatest Englishmen have laboured in the cause, supplying the seeks to taint justice at its very source. And this materials out of which that grand edifice has been is the great Proconsul whose praises have been constructed. Guilt, whatsoever its moral certainty, is sung by friendly critics! Strongly opposed as we are incapable of being punished unless legally proved. The man accused of an offence must be presumed innocent until his offence is established beyond the possibility of a doubt. Hearsay or general report is rigidly excluded. Either direct evidence or the most correct inferences from proved circumstances must form the basis of a conviction or sentence. The guilty may escape, but innocence should on no account suffer. The greatest jurists have held that the publicity, worry, disgrace, and expenses of a criminal trial exercise, even on the most deprayed, an effect as deterrent as that of a conviction followed by sentence. Even this constitutes the chief vindication of the doctrine that the escape of even ten guilty persons is not so baneful as the conviction of a single innocent man. Sir Charles Elliott, with all his learning, is ignorant of the principles of criminal jurisprudence as also of the utility of those rules of evidence upon which courts of justice act. Sir Rivans Thompson had been a successful District and Session Judge. There was no danger, under his rule, of any interference with officials engaged in administering the law. Sir Ashley Eden and Sir Steuart Bayley were both Bengal Civilians. Though not lawyers themselves, they had been trained in a respect for the law and its recognised methods of application. The late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal had achieved his laurels in districts and provinces administered according to the Non-Regulation system. He had seen his own will do duty for the law. He had never listened to the arguments of Counsel or even of petty Muktears in disposing of such matters, civil or criminal, as came before him. Hence Bengal with her law-governed constitution was utterly distasteful to him. He could not brook the idea that any Magistrate should be prevented from punishing a person sent up by the Police after sufficient enquiry. thought that rules of evidence should operate to exclude this or that fact or paper from the cognizance of the court was gall and wormwood to him. According to him, the Magistrate, when trying a prisoner, should not be bound by any law to proceed in the known groove which the wisdom of even Indian legislators has provided. On the other hand, the Magistrate should be free as the mountain air to do whatever he pleased for discovering the truth of the matter before him. The Indian Evidence Act has reduced the entire Law of Evidence into only a hundred and sixty-seven short sections. Even this is too much for Sir Charles's Magistrates. He wants to caution them against the "danger of holding up an impossibly high standard of evidence.' They are, therefore, for winning his praise, to con-vict persons placed before them even when the evidence is weak! If, instead of general advice which, however ably conched in words, cannot, from its very nature, fail to be somewhat vague, Sir Charles Elliott had written a little book on the exact measure of evidence that would justify a conviction, he would certainly have achieved a lasting fame under terms exceedingly cheap.

Seriously speaking, no advice could be more baneful in its consequences upon both the people and the Government than what the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal dared to openly give to his brethren of the Service. As we have already said, it weakens the very foundations of British rule It to the mischievous policy of Sir Charles Elliott in reducing the value of the highest compensation that British rule has granted to the people of India for their loss of freedom. we would not wish Sir Charles to stand a trial, for even a petty offence—the gen-tlemanly one, for example, of knocking down, when hungry, a disobedient native—before one of his own model Magistrates capable of acting up to his sound advice about the standard of evidence needed for a confiction.

THE PANDITS OF BENGAL AND SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT.

For the grant that Sir Charles Elliott's Government made for the encouragement of Sanskrit learning in Bengal, the great Pandits of this province presented to him, on the eve of his retirement, a couple of addresses in Sanskrit prose and verse, acknowledging their obligations. The Pandits eschew politics altogether, and confine themselves to matters concerning them alone. The addresses, though indulging in a little fulsome adulation, are innocent enough. Yet the Pandits and their leaders are being abused by a certain section of the Calcutta press, in no measured terms, Mahamahopadhya Mahesh Chandra Nyaratna having the largest share. We are not concerned in vindicating or taking exception to what he has done. To those, however, who are pouring their Billingsgate on him, it ought to be obvious that, even on the supposition that he was the prime mover, it does not follow that he deserves nothing but censure. He had tried previous rulers for pecuniary aids for the same purpose. They promised but did nothing. Sir Charles Elliott took up the question earnestly, and, in spite of the inevitable circumlocution of red tape, was able to pass his final orders ere half the term of his office had expired. The neo-Hindu exponents of the Press may not attach any value to the grants-in-aid made by the Government of Sir Charles. Their idea perhaps is that the Pandits should live on air, or on something still less substantial, as, for instance, fine phrases. Looked at from the point of view of practical men, Sir Charles Elliott gave great encouragement to the cultivation of Sanskrit, and, according to the rules of morality taught by the Hindu shastras, it was clearly incumbent on the Pandits to acknowledge the debt of gratitude to their benefactor, Much has been made of the fact that, although Pandit Nyaratua had settled at Benares, yet he came down again to the sphere of his political activity to arrange what has been called the "Puja" of Charles Elliott. Admitting that the Pandit had left Calcutta for good, the fact that he returned to the metropolis, and either originated or joined in the recent demonstration, does not necessarily imply anything discreditable to him. How the movement originated among the Pandits is not known to us. Mahamahopadhya Nyaratna was perhaps its leading spirit. But long before the late Lieutenant-Governor laid down the reins of office, the opinion had become general among the Pandits of Nadia that they were bound in duty to express their gratitude to him. They intended to ask Sir Charles to visit their town and to be lionised there. But the illness and the untimely death of their leader, Babu Mahendra Nath Bhattacharjea, upset their plans. About the end of November last, the Pandits of the other parts of Bengal held a meeting at Calcutta and manimously resolved es, Sir Charles Elliott replied, briefly explain-upon an address. The Pandits of Nadia had ing the origin of the scheme for encouraging been asked to join. They held a meeting to determine their course of action. They decided that it would not be consistent with their position to accept a footing of equality with the Pandiss of other places. Simplementally with the Pandiss of other places. Simultaneously they felt it absolutely incumbent on them to do something for Sir Charles Elliott. Such a demonstration was necessary, not only as a matter of duty but also as one of policy. The stipends granted for the students and the Pandits of Nadia, have not yet been made permanent. They have been sanctioned as a tentative measure. Such being the case, it would have been simple madness on the part of the Nadia Pandits to refrain from a movement for honouring Sir Charles Elliott. We do not mean to say that the authorities would have actually gone so far as to withdraw the grants to punish the contumacious Pandits. At the same time we could not condemn the professors of the toles if they entertained such apprehensions. As a matter of fact, the line of action they took was dictated not so much by considerations of their interests as a class, as by their ideas of duty Gratitude is an irksome feeling to many men in this world. But, according to our holy legislators, there is not a greater sin than ingratitude.

Some of our contemporaries have condemned the action of Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhuttacharya for his part in the demonstration. The Doctor however had little choice in the matter. He had been in a manner forced by his townsmen to accept the office of President of the Nadia College of Pandits vacated by the death of his brother. He tried his best to have his fellow-townsman Rai Bahadoor Dwarka Nath Bhattacharya, M.A., B.L., for the office. But the Rai Bahadoor persistently refused the honour, and the general opinion that it was due to the Doctor was so strong that he had to yield. Though much older in age, the Rai Bahadoor has agreed to be one of the other office-bearers of the institution. He accompanied the deputation that waited on Sir Charles Elliott. It is not true that the great Pandits of Nadia kept themselves aloof from the movement. They joined it one and all, despite all efforts to the contrary.

The deputation consisted of at least one hundred of the leading Pandits, hailing from every part of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. There were present not only most of the Mahamahopadhyas but also most of the untitled giants of Sanskrit learning. After introducing them to Sir Charles Elliott, Mahamahopadhya Mahesh Chandra made a brief speech observing that it was in every sense a representative gathering of Pandits, the like of which had never before greeted any previous ruler. The suc-cess of the deputation was somewhat marred by the failure of Pandit Dukhmochan Jha to read the address with sufficient fluency. He is a veteran scholar, and is the eldest son of the great Sanskritist of the last generation Pandit Bapu Jan Jha. Age has impaired the eyes of Dukhmochan, and the Pandit Sabha of Calcutta made a mistake in selecting him as the reader. However, the disappointment caused by the Mithila Pandit was wellnigh removed by the fervour with which Dr. Jogendranath Bhuttacharya as President of the Nadia College of Pandits, read the addressof the Society. After the reading of the addressSanskrit toles. At the request of Sir Charles Elliott, Dr. Bhuttacharya explained the purport in Bengali. The deputation ended with the reciting of some verses composed extempore by Pandit Mahesh Chander Chudamani, the family priest of the Maharaja of Dinajpore.

THE LITERATURE OF BENGAL.

A European colleague of Mr. R. C. Dutt, of the Indian Civil Service, expressed surprise at the "modernity" of much of the old Bengali poetry quoted in his book "The Literature of Bengal," and, being under the impression that Bengali was one of the latest of civilized languages, told Mr. Dutt so, adding that the prose specimens in legal deeds of 120 years back shew that neither the grammar nor the syntax of the language was then in a settled state. We annex Mr. Dutt's reply. It explains some of the points touched upon in the book. He writes:---

"Bidyapati was not a Bengali poet. He was a native of Behar, a Behari poet, and wrote in Hindi like other Behari poets. It is a common mistake to call him the father of Bengali poetry; he is not that in any sense of the phrase, except that his poetry in Hindi inspired Chandidas, the father of Bengali poetry.

John Beames made a mistake inchis Grammar of Aryan Languages in considering Bidyapati a Bengali poet, and inferring that his lawguage (Hindi) was the language of Bengal in the 14th century. Grierson, with whom I had a talk on the subject, will tell you exactly Bidyapati's place among Behari poets:—he has no place among Bengali poets.

The poetry of Chandidas who flourished almost contemporaneously with Bidyapati shews that the language of Bengal in the 14th century was what it is now,---Bengali, not Hindi.

'Not recognizing Bidyapati to be a Bengali poet I have not devoted a chapter to him. I have noticed his poetry in the chapter on Chandidas because Chandidas is vastly indebted to the Behar poet and borrows his inspiration from him.

Many Bengali sougs are current in Bengal and occasionally appear in print which go under the name of Bidyapati. These are only Bengali imitations of Bidyapati's Hindi poetry, for Bidyapati wrote nothing in Bengali. There is no reason to suppose that Bidyapati's Hindi poems which I have quoted in my book are modernized.

Similarly there is no reason to suppose that Chandidas's Bengali songs which I have quoted in my book are modernized. The language of poetry was in Bengal much the same in the 15th and 16th and 17th centuries as it is now, except that it is a little more Sanscritised in our own age. See the passage in p. 57 taken from a MSS. Ramayana of 1693. The passage, I believe, was the same as Krittibas wrote it in the 15th or 16th century, and it is not obsolete in any way,—there is not a word in it which is obsolete. This proves that the literary Bengali language is some centuries old, and not of modern growth, and that it was much the same in the 15th and 16th centuries as it is now. Read again the several passages quoted from Mukundaram of the 17th century in pages 96 to 113. They are quoted from an edition compiled from old MSS. as I have said in p. 103, and yet they are not obsolete.

What you say about Bengali being of recent formation is true of Bengali prose. We had no Bengali prose literature before this century, and the official documents of previous centuries, of which you speak may well be obsolete to some extent now. Ram Mohan Roy's prose which I have quoted in pages 142 and 143 strikes us as somewhat antiquated, and I have said so at page 139. Even Iswar Gupta's prose quoted in pp. 158 and 159, though scarcely half a century old, is to us what English prose previous to Queen Anne's time is to modern Englishmen. Vidyasagar and Akhoy Kumar have done for Bengali prose what Addison and his contemporaries have done for English prose.

Among the later chapters of my book, Chapter XVII on dramatic writers will probably interest you as you have taken a great deal of interest in modern Bengali Drama. And you will be amused to read in that chapter under what influences a Hindu-College Young Bengal like Madhu Sudan Datta for the first time turned to the vernacular of his country afterwainly trying to win his laurels in English. The life of Madhu Sudan Datta (chapter XVIII) is instructive for this reason. There is no doubt that Young Bengal neglected his mother tongue for 40 years after the establishment of the Hindu College, but I do not regret his partiality for western thought and western languages. New ideas and a new inspiration were sadly required after the effete literature of the time of Bharat Chandra Rai, and modern Bengali writers have drawn that inspiration and will continue to draw it for years to come from the west, through the English language. For this remon, English education is a help to us for the development of Bengali literature."

In connection with the book and our notice of it, we have received the following letter from a diligent student of Bengali:

Sir, --- Mr. R. C. Dutt's recent publication, Literature of Bengat, has been reviewed elaborately in the last issue of your much esteemed journal. The critical observations are, indeed, worthy of the paper. There are a few points in the book, as well as in your remarks, on which, I think, it is necessary to say a few words.

You remark that "the songs of Ram Bose and others among his competitors, if collected from the old men who still recite or sing them with rapturous delight," &c. The songs of these immortal Bengali bards and Kabiwalas have already been collected and published by Kedarnath Bandyopadhya of Dakhineshwar and can be had at the market at Re. 1-4. It is a neatly got-up book with nearly all the well-known songs of the famous Kabiwalas of Bengal, namely, (1) Haru Thakur, (2) Ram Bosc, (3) Shatu Roy, (4) Gangadhur Mookerjee, (5) Nalu Nandalala, (6) Bholanath, (7) Antony Saheb, (8) Nilu Patni, (9) Rushu Nrishingha, (10) Kristo Bhattya, &c., &c. Short accounts are given of the lives of these immortal ten and their satellites. These songs were at first collected by the late Ishwar Chandra Gupta, the Editor of Sambad Prabbakar, but were not published by him. In 1890 they were published with an excellent review by an eminent literary man of Bengal, a profound Sanskrit scholar. Mr. Dutt, being an England-returned Bengali and a Civilian to boot, is, I am afraid, ignorant of the existence of this book, which, no doubt, is a telling sign of the revival of Bengali Literature.

As regards the unfortunate Ranga Lal Banerjea, the remarks which you have been pleased to make, are worthy of you. Every Bengali, interested in the welfare of his mother-tongue, ought to feel grateful to you. We are really deficient in appreciating true poetic faculty and genius. We often fail to honour merit. Mr. R. C. Dutt is carried away by his devotion to Michael Datta so effectually as to do an injustice to Ranga Lal Banerjee.

In the paragraph on journalism, in the last chapter of the book, Mr. Dutt, the President of the Bengal Academy of Literature, barely mentions the immortal Hurish Chunder Mookerjee, and Kristodas Pal too---"the self-seeking demagogue" of the Calcutta University Magazine. But a notice of journalism in Bengal, without the names of the late lamented Grish Chandra Ghosh, the founder of both the Hindoo Patriot and the Bengales (the latter is now conducted by a friend of Mr. Dutt) and Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the most celebrated paragraphist and leaderwriter that the Eastern world, (why not Western also, on the authority of the distinguished Professor Vambéry?) has ever seen and produced, is very like the play of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark left out. Mr. R. C. Dutt, perhaps, does not know the names of these immortal men. The former, snatched away somewhat prematurely by the hand of death, is unknown to the Philistines. But what of the latter? Is he also unknown to the Philistines of Babudom? We, may not, however, fall foul Babudom throughout the length and breadth of the land. Bengal takes no pleasure in honoring her greatest sons. Like Sir Henry Taylor, the author of Philip Van Artevelde, we must rest content with the thought stat "the world knows nothing of its greatest men."

Again, nearly all the extracts of Mr. R. C. Dutt's book, from the works of Bengali winers, are taken, without a word of acknowledgment, from Pap. t Ramgati Nayaratna's famous work on the same subject. M. Dutt's book is an abridged English translation of Pandir Nyaratua's. The amount of knowledge required for wing such works satisfactorily can hardly be found among mr f men of Bengal. A sound Sanskrit scholar like the late lamenta Pandit may undertake the task, but still there are many obstacles in the way. Mr. Dutt's book may satisfy superficial readers, but it is not for those who know anything of the subject.

The book is dedicated to a relative of Mr. Dutt, Rai Sashi Chandra Dutt. Bahadur, the famous author of The Reminiscences of a Kerani's Life, for whose sake Rai Kristodas Pal Bahadur once emancipated himself from the restrictions of truth and even probability. The chapters of the Literature of Bengal, were first published in the Bengal Magazine now defunct, edited by the late lamented Rev. Lalbehari Dey, in three consecutive years, 1874, 1875 and 1876, and not in 1877 as Mr. Dutt mentions in his preface very forgetfully. They appeared under the nom-de-plume Arcyda. The last chapter is disfigured by numerous instances of the author's narrow prejudices. A good advertisement occurs of the literary products of the Rambagan Dutt family, the author's own. The fact is, that the subject is such that Mr. R. C. Dutt's qualifications fall short of it. Though a Bengali, he is a cockney by birth. He has studied the subject in later life. He has certainly shown the book-making art in producing the volume, but no originality nor research. The investigations, as regards many points, have not been advanced by even one step beyond the line reached by Pandit Ramgati Nayaratna. The criticisms, again, of most of the Bengali authors, besides being superficial, are stale. The criticisms by Ramgati Nayaratna are certainly more interesting and pleasanter reading. It would have enhanced the value of Mr. R. C. Dutt's book if he had translated the condemnatory portions of the Pandit's critiques on some of the modern Bengali poets.

THE DECADENT "SIR."

It is perhaps inevitable that English should become vulgarised the more we educate the "masses." Great, however, as have been the bearing of cheap schools in the direction of raising the standard of intelligence and diminishing the statistics of crime, no standard of intelligence and diministing the statistics of chief, and one can help viewing with regret the extraordinary change they have produced in the phraseology of the people. David Macrae describes the American negro as "clitching at a polysyllable as a drowning man clutches at a straw." These words apply forcibly to the better class of British working men to-day-not, of course, to the brutalised navvy, whose vocabulary is still supposed to be limited to 200 words, chiefly adjectives, but to the intelligent workman who reads the newspapers and attends political meetings. It is difficult, by the way, to gauge the influence which newspapers and platform orators have exercised in moulding the remarkable English of the "New Proletarian." But the fact remains that a man of this ctype uses as many long words as an English speaking man of this ctype uses as many long words as an English speaking Native of Bengal, and often with as little regard to their mean, ing or appropriateness. "Turn" becomes "revolve," "see" "perceive," and "mean" "intend," while words like "anticipate," "incomprehensible" (which frequently has a double application) "beneficial," "qualify," and a hundred other sonorous expressions are scattered plentifully throughout their daily speech.

Strange and sad are the metamorphoses which a number of these classical houses wideren through receated application to debased classical phrases undergo through repeated application to debased uses. The most serious danger threatening them is, however, their total elimination from the vocabulary of the politic. Wild horses will not induce people of refinement to associate themselves with usages which have been trailed in the guiver; and the tendency is templates modifications in those cases where a jury is called.

to avert the danger of contamination by giving them as wide a It is thus necessary to deal with the order literally and in its

of Mr. Dutt, for an unwillingness to de justice to Ghosh and borth as possible. Slang is the extreme antithesis of elaborate Mookerjee is a fault which is shared with Mr. Dutt by "cultured" diction. In their endeavonr to escape from the latter, the "hupper suckles," as Jeames de la Pluche would say, have drawn upon the resources of the former, and from them slang terms have descended, like the gentle rain from Heaven, upon the places beneath! Before the approach of slang many of the older and statelier forms of address have practically disappeared. Of none, perhaps, is the extinction more to be regretted than of the characteristically English "Sir." We do not need to be reminded of the fact that it is still used upon formal occasions, and as the medium by which to approach a social or official superior. But it is unnecessary to remind any one that as an embellishment of ordinary conversation ite has ceased to exist. In reply to the reader who is not laudator temporo acti, and who sees nothing fine in the word, it is sufficient to refer to Boswell's Johnson, where it is seen in its best and most varied applications. "Mr. Johnson," cries Boswell on being introduced ed applications. "Mr. Johnson," cries Boswell on being introduced to the great man, "I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it." "That, Sir," is the retort, "that Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help." "Sir," savs Mr. Boswell at their next meeting, "I am afraid that I intrude upon you." "Sir," replies the Doctor, "I am obliged to any man who visits me." "Why yes, Sir," observed the lexicographer on another notable occasion, "Sherry (Sheridan) is dull, naturally dull; Such an excess of stupidity, Sir, is not in nature." Here we have the "Sir" depreciatory, the "Sir" courteous, and the "Sir" Such an excess of stupianty, on, is not in nature.

There we have the "Sir" depreciatory, the "Sir" courteous, and the "Sir" sarcastic. The word has been spoken of as characteristically English, and so much may be confidently claimed for it. It is one of the shortest words spoken. There is a curt dignity about it such as we only associate with the Anglo-Saxon organy about a such as we only associate with the High-saxon reace. It is much more effective than the French and German equivalents of "Monsetur" and "Mein Herr." "Sir!" exclaims Miss Lydia Languish to Captain Absolute, and that warrior falls back, with the remark "Egad! That danned monosyllable has frozen me." It is strikingly English, too, in its nullitarian and back, with the remark "Egad! That damned monosyllable has frozen me." It is strikingly English, too, in its utilitarian and adaptable qualities. We use it as the habitual designation of a k.c.s.t. or a baronet. It is a term of respect which may be applied either to a deserving beggar, or to a King. "Will your men fight?" asked William III. of the traitor Hamilton at the Boyne. "On my honour, Sir, I think they will," was the reply. "Your honour, Sir, retorted his Majesty, though we admit that the emphasis on this occasion was on the word "honour."

One of our grievances is that even when used nour description.

One of our grievances is that even when used nowadays it is frequently misapplied. If its original meaning was "senior," "elder," "superior," it cannot but sound incongruously when a grey haired veteran in the campaign of life is heard to "Sir" a good-for-nothing whipper-snapper not ont of his trens. It was because the late Dr. S. C. Mookerjee recognised the true inswardness of the term that he once declared that his Biahmanic pride revolted from the thought of addressing a Sudra as "Sir." This, by the way, was only one of the many instances which prove the thoroughness with which that remarkable man had assimilated the English spirit, and the English modes of expression. Thackeray could not have hit upon a better expedient for bringing out the innate vulgarity of the unfortinate Bob Stubbs than by introducing his conversation with the German shoemaker. "Sir, indeed!" cries Bob, in reply to the respectful shortmarker. Sin finded: "the Boy, in Toply of the Isoperum sahntation of the tradesman, "I'd have you know that when you speak to a lord you have no business to address him as "Sir." "Anyone but Bob Stubbs would have known that "Sir" conveys the notion of respect with a lar givater force than either "My Lord," or "Your Lordship," Even "Your Excellence" is cless imposing and comprehensive title than Captain Absolute's monogyllable. Of its intrinsic dignity and worth at least one character in Shakespeare was fully persuaded; for he was "Jack Faldaff" with his familiars "John" with his brothers and sisters, and "Sir John" with all

THE RANAGHAT PETROLEUM PROSECUTION THE FINDING OF THE MAGISTRATE.

Proceedings under Section 133, C. P. C., against Akhoy Kumar Gliose.

On July 30th of this year the District Magistrate of Nadia issued an order on Aukhoy Kumar Ghoes to remove netroleum from his depôt at Ranaghat on the ground that truning and sporing petroleum opposite the railway station was likely to cause conflagrapetroleum opposite the ranivay station was likely to cause conflagra-tion of explosion. On August 8th the said Aukliny Kumar Ghose ap-peared and showed cause, he also asked that the proceedings should be transferred to another court. Ultimately the case was transferred by the High Court to this court and the question now beforce me is simply to decide whether the above order is reasonable and proper or not. I do not consider that it has within the province of this Court to modify the order as the chapter of the Criminal Procedure Code with which we are now concerned only con-templates modifications in those cases where a jury is called.

entirety. In my view of the law it lies upon Aukhoy Kumar Ghose to show that the order was not reasonable. The section under which the order purports to have been issued runs as "Wholever a District Magistrate the disposal of any substance as likely to occathat sion conflagration or explosion, should be "stopped, he may make a conditional order requiring the person owning, possessing "or controlling such" substance, "to sessing " " or controlling such " substance, " to alter the disposal of such substance;" &c., &c.

In this case the District Magistrate considered the disposal, that is, the tinning and storing of the petroleum to be likely to cause conflagration or explosion and he consequently ordered the absolute removal of the petroleum.

I am not prepared to maintain this as a reasonable and proper order. Tinning and storing without proper precaution might be such a disposal as would be likely to cause conflagration or explosion, but such is not the state of affairs as disclosed in the order. Timing and storing alone comprise the disposal complained of and ir would be straining the law to hold that total removal of the substance amounted to a reasonable alteration in the disposal thereof. Before a Magistrate could legally order the disposal of petroin the ordinary course of events might cause conflagration or exphosion. But the disposal which is required to be altered is merely tinning and storing. Tinning and storing are perfectly legitimate processes and in themselves need give rise to no apprehension of danger. Possibly the Magistrete meant that tining and storing carried on its the manner adopted by Aukhoy Kumar Ghose were dangerous, but this is not stated in the order nor can it bear that interpretation. The order merely propounds the theory that tinning and storing of petroleum constitute a disserted of the same as its likely, to constitute a disserted of the same as its likely, to constitute a disposal of the same as is likely to cause conflagration or ex-plosion, this is a proposition with which I find it impossible to concur. Under certain circumstances these processes are conducted without practical possibility of danger, under other circumstances it is concievable that very imminent danger may attend the operations; but in order to justify action by a Magistrate under section 133, C. P. C., it is necessary to state very clearly in the order what those circumstances are. Before this court both parties have confined themselves solely to producing evidence as to the manner in which tinning and storing are carried on by Aukhoy Kumar Ghose and as to the danger arising from the special methods employed by him in his depot, as distinguished from those in vogue elsewhere. As stated above I am not dis-posed to treat this case from such points of view at all. The order treats of tinning and storing generally--it does not find fault with Aukhoy Kumar Ghose's manner of doing business as regards any particular feature. But apart from more or less technical detects which in my opinion render the order unreasonable, the case has been fully tried on its merits. Apart from the wording of the order, the case for the prosecution is that Aukhoy Kumar Ghose carried on his business in a manner calculated to bring about a general conflagration and hence he was told to move his depôt into the middle of a field. This depôt was constructed in 1893 with the express sanction of the Municipal Commissioners. The rules under the Petroleum Act give the Commissioners power to grant licenses within Minicipal li tits: at least the Magistrate's license under Act XII of 1886 is not required within such limits (vole Calcut'a Gazaste of May 22nd 1895). The evidence adduced on both sides convinces me that up to a date just anterior to these proceedings the transport of oil to the depot, the filling of the tins and soldering were being done in a very careless manner. According to the expirt evidence adduced by the defence the danger is more apparent than real, but nevertheless I have no doubt that the disposal of petroleum at that time At the same time it must be admitted that from the very initiation of the dispute Aukhoy Kumar Ghose has shown himself ready to meet any suggestion made regarding the prevention of possible danger, short of maying his deput elsewhere---and it it shown that the trade with its necessary accompaniment can be carried on with safety in such a deput when necessary precautions are taken, I think it unreasonable to demand its removal and the duty of executive authority extends only to seeing that proper recautionary measures are taken. The evidence adduced in support of the views taken by the executive authorities of the Nadia District is of a very meagre description; it does not deal with the state of affairs at the time the order was issued and there is nothing to contradict the allegation of Aukhoy Kumai. Ghose that at the time when he was ordered to remove petroleom from his depot it was already empty. The evidence and general experience show that tinning and storing of petroleom can be carried on without manifest danger to the public. Such a disposal of petroleum is not calculated to esuse conflagration or explosion. In order to satisfy myself more and thoroughly on these points I have sitted the depot at Ranaghat male the large depot in Calcutta and small shops in Circular Road and Jaunbazar. I have also taken measures to ascertain how the vide is carried on in this district at commercial centres like Serampore, Seoraphuli and Tarakeswar.

The precautions taken by Aukhov K. mar. Grose at Ranaghat, so far as the evidence goes, appear to be of equal efficacy with those taken elsewhere. Experiments to test the inflammability of oil, similar to that dealt in by hear, have also been conducted in my presence. That the precautions, alleged by the witnesses, were often disregarded is I think beyond casonable doubt, witnesses, were often disregarded is I think beyond assonable doubt, and if I had the power I should have mediated be order as no and it I had the power I should have medial definition of the enter as to ensure the enforcement of these precautions which are admittedly necessary, but as it lies with me to find definitely whether he order as it stands literally is reasonable or not, I have no hesticion in deciding against it. Under Section 137, C.P.C., I am satisfies hat the order made by the District Magistrate of Nadia is reasonable and proper and no farther proceedings shall be take. under such order.

THE DOG, THE MAN, AND THE MEAT.

A FRIEND of mine and I were walking together the other day; a nog dished plot us after something he saw on the pavement. It was a big piece of meat. He pounced on it and swallowed it in two seconds, My compliation looked at the dog with envious admiration. "My humble friend," he said, "Pll give you £5,000 for your appetite and your digestion, you are not afraid to eat; I am." But the dog knew which thopmess is made of. He declined the offer and totted away.

It is astonishing how many different people use this expression. "I A FRIEND of mine and I were walking together the other day; a dog

As the writer pens these lines five letters he on the table before him, every one of them containing it. Yet the persons who wrote the letters are not known to one amother. There was, therefore, no agreement among them. Why should there be, even if they were acquainted?

No, there is nothing in it to wonder at. They went through the same experience, and express it in the most natural way, that's all.

But what does it mean? Are people suspicious of poisoned food? No, no; that is not so. The food is not poisoned before it is eaten, but afterwards. An example will show what really occurs, and why so many are afraid to eat.

but afterwards. An example will show what really occurs, and why so many are afraid to eat.

We quote from one of the letters: "One night, early in 1892," says the writer, "I was seized with dreadful pains in the pit of the siomach, and a choking sensation in the throat. I feated I was going to die, My wife called in a neighbour. They applied hat finniels and tin pentioe, but I got no relief. Then a doctor came and gave me medicine. He said he never saw anyone's tongae in such a condition. It was of a yellow colour, and covered with a slimy phlegin, so thick I could have scraped it with a knife. I had a foul, bitter taste in the mouth, and my eyes were so dull I could scarcely see. I had a heavy pain in the side, and felt so dejected and miserable I didn't know what to do wish myself. What little food I took gave me so much pain I was afficial to ease the pain.

cat. The doctor put me on statutation dies, and injected morphine to ease the pain.

"Getting no real benefit from the first doctor I saw another, who said I had eally gement of the liver. He gave me medicines, but I got no better In August I went to Exmooth to see what my native air would do for one, but Clune back warse than ever. in weight, and being too weak to move about I used to be on the couch most of the time. I never expected to get well, and didn't care much whith he came of me.

"One day in Ortober my wife said," It appears the doctors can do noting for you, so I am going to doctor you myself." She went to the Southern Drug Stores, in Camberwell Road, and gut a bottle of Mother Sough's Carative Syrup. After taking this medicine for a few days, the punin my stom scholeft me, my appetite improved, and I gained some strength. Soon afterwards I was back at my work. The people in the office, seeing how well I looked, asked what had caned me, and I miswered Mother Seigel's Syrup. I shall be glad to reply to any inquiries about my case. (Signed) Charles Harris, 74, Beresfurd Siriet, Camberwell, London, December 1st, 1892."

Mr. Hirris' statement goes straight to the point. Why was he afrud to eit? Because his food gave him pain without giving him strength. This wis dead wrong. It was exactly the reverse of what it should have been. When a man is the proper form he gets vigure and power from his oscals, and ears them with enjoyment and relish. If he doesn't there is something the matter with him. What is it?

Now let your thoughts expand a bit, so as to take in a broad principle. One man's meat is another man's poison, they say. That's so, but it's only half the truth. Any man's meat is any man's poison, under ertain conditions. If grain never got any further than the mill hopper we should never have bread, and if bread (or other food) never got cforther than the stomach we should never have strength. See? Well when the stomach is torpid, inflamed, und "ON STRIKE," what happens? Why, your food lies in it and rots. The fermentations produces poisons which get into the blood and kicks up the worst sort of mischief all over the body. This is indigestion and dyspepsia, though the doctors call each and every trick of it by a separate name. Yet they don't cure it which is the main thing after all.

But Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup does, as

OPINION ON THE BOOK.

It is a most interesting record of the life of a remarkable man,--Mr. H. Bahington Smith, Private Secretary to the Viceroy, 5th October,

Dr. Mookeijee wis a filmons letter-writer, and there is a breezy freshness and origin dry about his concespondence which make it very interesting reading.—Sir Alfred W. Corft, very interesting reading.—Sir Alfred W. Corf., K.C. 14., Director of Public Instriction, Bengal 26th September, 1895.

Its not that anothe pressure of horassing official duries an English Credion can find either time or opportunity to pay sagarceful a tibute to the memory of a native personality as F.H. Skime has done in his biography of the Lite Dr. Samblin Chindler Modernes, staas F. H. Skime has done in his hogiciphy of the late Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known. Bengal journalist (Calcutta. Thacker, Spink and Co.); not are there many who are more worthy of being thus homoured than the late Editar of Reas and Rayyet. We may at any rate conduity agree with Mr. Skime that the story of Mnokerjee's life, with all its lights, and shadows, is preguant with lessuas for those who desire to know the real India.

No weekly paper, Mr. Skune fells us, not even the Hindoo Patriot, to its palament driven made Kistodas Patriot, to its palament driven and the second manual programment of the patriot, and harvet.

A man of large beart and great qualities, his death from promount in the rank spring in the last year was a distinct and heavy loss to Indian poundance of the Iring and though a large participation. It is another than the large participation of India, (Rombay) September 20, 1895.

It is a rely that the life of an Indian journal ist heames would be the form Indian poundary and Anglo-Indian and a member of the Indian Carl Service. But, it his among Indian health and the Indian Carl Service. But, it has more poundaists has been considered worthy of health and bear worthy of health and standard Standard (Mahas). For much of the hiographical matter that For much of the higgraphical matter that issues so freely from the press an indext is needed. Indian journalists, and in miny respects occupied a higher plane thin they did, and looked at pub is affering from a different point of view from thems, could not be suffered to sink into oblivious without some attenant to perpetuate his memory by the usual px0s agent of a "life." The difficulties common is all bragraphers have in this case been in the case been in y special currents traces, but the least of syring, is that the author belongs to a diffinity. ent race from the subject. It is true that number Early much there were many admirers of the learned Ductor, and that he on his side understood the English character as few foreigners noderstand it. But in spite of this and his remarkable assumilation of English modes of thought and expression, Dr. Mooker-jee remained to the last a Bi diman of the Brahmans—a conservation of the best of his inheritance that was nothing but respect and approvid. In consequence of this, his ideal biographer would have been one of his own distribes, with the same inherited sympothies, and trained like him in Western learning. If Heag it had produced such another man as Dr. Mookerjee, it was he who should have written Moderage, it was ne who should have been the fife.

The biography is wrimly appreciative without being needlessly landitory; it gives on the what a complete picture of the man (and in the book there is not a dail page.

A few of the letters addressed to Dr. Moo-kerper are of such mann appearance that they maghichave been omitted with advantage, but but a word of his now letters could have been me an according to the action of the action of the action of the action of the action of the action of the action. The action of the action is a synthesis to say that is short of the action. He action is easy and concect, clear and straightfaward, without Oriental Inxiniance or strong after effect. Perhaps he is never so chaiming as when he is laying down the laws of hierary form to young aspirants to fame. The letter on page 285, for instance, is a delightful piece of criticism; it is delicate plan-speaking, and he recomplishes the difficult feat of telling a wallfildie poef that his productions are not us, the smallest digree poetry, without one may conclude, either offending the youth or repressing his aidour.

The career of "An Indian Journalist" as described by F. H. Skrine of the Indian Civil Science is sectice body interesting.

If the training and experience which develop the journalist in England are sometimes varied, they seem in India to have an even wider range.

But the object of this natice is to show how But the object of this natice is to show how a great Bengari journalist is made; space forbuls us to enter up in his actual performances. They will be found set forth at sufficient length, and with much felicity of expression, in Mr. Skirne's admirable monograph. It is chartefects to the noble service to which Mr. Skirne's helpings, that such a book should have issued from its ranks. Dr. Mookerjee was no untimest. This was true of the pre-Mutiny Io-lia of 1851. If it is no longer true of the Queen's India of 1895, we owe it in no small measure to Indian journalists like Dr. Maokeijee who have laboured, amid some misrepresentation, to quicken the some misrepresentation, to quicken the "semblance of life into a living reality.—The Times, (Landon) October 14, 1895.
